The writer who lately discoursed on "Christian Science" in the columns of the Westminster Gazette certainly did not treat the latest fashionable superstition and its hierarchy with undue severity. On the contrary, he might have expressed himself much more freely, and have worded his criticism much more sharply, without going beyond what the facts justify. The "Christian Scientists," as they call themselves, are pestilent and mischievous quacks, and I think I can show that they have so proved themselves.

For the benefit of those who have not seen the articles on this subject, which have appeared recently in various papers, let me first explain what "Christian Science" is To the ordinary observer it looks very much like the "faith-healing" which has flourished spasmodically in different places in all ages of the world. It professes, however, to be something different from this—nothing less, in fact, than a reduction to scientific terms of the principles on which the Gospel miracles were wrought, and an application of these principles to the treatment of all ills that afflict our mortal bodies. The Christian Scientists assert, in so many words, that they can to-day repeat most of the "so-called miracles of Jesus" (their own expression), and that they will be able to perform any of the wonders recorded in the New Testament as their "science" develops. This, it will be admitted, is rather a large order. In case I am suspected of doing any injustice to the authors of this startling discovery, I can only refer the doubter to their chief text-book. This volume is entitled Science and Health, with Key to the Scriptures. It is the work of Mrs. Mary Barker G. Eddy, President of Massachusetts Metaphysical College, and founder or discoverer of the new science—ex Americâ semper aliquid novi. The book is published at Boston, and is sold in England at 14s. net, and it is, I should say, the most amazing farrago of pretentious platitudes, metaphysical moonshine, and incoherent gush that has ever issued from a printing press. The nature and scope of the new science are thus summarised by Mrs. Mary G. Eddy at an early stage of her discourse (page 17):—

> The term Christian Science was introduced by the author to designate the Scientific system of Metaphysical Healing.
> The revelation consists of two parts:
> 1. The discovery of this Divine Science of Mind-healing, through a spiritual sense of the Scriptures, and through the teachings of the Comforter, as promised by the Master.
> 2. The proof, by present demonstration, that the so-called miracles of Jesus did not specially belong to a dispensation now ended, but that they illustrate an ever-operative Divine Principle. The operation of this Principle indicates forever the Scientific order and continuity.

The fundamental idea—if I may presume to attempt to state any article of the creed in my own feeble language—is that nothing really exists but Mind or Spirit (it is not quite clear which, and they get mixed up inextricably in the course of the book), that Matter is a mere illusion, and that, consequently, Mind can make anything that it pleases of Matter, if it only goes the right way to work. The bearing of this doctrine upon the ills of the flesh will be readily perceived. Your body being a mere illusion conjured up by your mind, by operating upon the mind you can vary at will the conditions of the illusion, and I suppose its whole nature. In fact, it is obvious that only by operating on the mind can you get at the root of the mischief, and to operate upon the body under such circumstances would be mere ignorant empiricism. The principle of the thing is thus illustrated at page 46 of Mrs. Eddy's magnum opus:—

> You say a boil is painful; but that is impossible, for matter without mind is not painful. The boil simply manifests your belief in pain through inflammation and swelling, and you call this belief a boil. Now administer mentally to your patient a high attenuation of truth on this subject, and it will soon cure the boil. The fact that pain cannot exist where there is no mortal mind to feel it, is a proof that this so-called mind makes its own pain—that is its own belief in pain.

In theory, nothing could be more simple or intelligible. In practice, however, there seem to be sundry difficulties in the way, one of them being that the Christian Scientist must not only cure the patient of a belief in his boil, but cure all his friends and acquaintance at the same time. Say, for instance, that I have an obtrusive carbuncle on my nose. I call in the Christian Scientist, who administers "a high attenuation of truth." My belief in the carbuncle disappears, and with it goes the carbuncle too, so far as I am concerned. It may be that I look in the glass and perceive no carbuncle. The Christian Scientist takes her fee and leaves me. In comes my friend Brown, and greets me with, "Hullo! old man, you have got a nose on you!" or some such vulgar and inconsiderate remark. I endeavour to assure him that he is mistaken, and that the carbuncle is a creation of his diseased imagination. But Jones and Robinson speedily turn up, and accost me in similar terms, until my mind becomes impressed with an uneasy suspicion that all is not as it should be with my nose. The morbid delusion of my friends extends to me. I take up the glass again, and there, sure enough, is the carbuncle as large and angry as ever. Under these circumstances, it seems a clear waste of money to pay a Christian Scientist to cure my carbuncle, unless the fee is to include the treatment of the whole circle of my friends, and indeed of any one whom I may meet by chance in the street. I rather fancy that the Scientists have met with this difficulty in practice, for I find that in many cases which they have taken under their treatment it has been a sine quâ non that the patient should be isolated from communication with everybody except the physician.

There is yet another difficulty, and that is that, as Mrs. Mary G. Eddy, her immortal work, and her representatives in this country, are all material objects, of whose existence we are only aware by the evidence of our senses, there is no security whatever that the whole thing is not a mental delusion. How am I to know that Mrs. Eddy has any more substantial existence than the carbuncle on my nose? It is just as easy to lose belief in one as to lose belief in the other. Or, again, Matter being absolutely under the control of Mind, it is possible, by a pure intellectual effort, to establish in the public mind a conviction that Mrs. Eddy is an impostor, and that "Science and Health" is all bunkum. What I propose to do now is to treat Mrs. Eddy and the Christian Scientists with a "high attenuation of Truth," and see how they come out under the treatment.

Christian Scientists have been preaching their gospel in this country for three or four years past. It is a somewhat singular fact that the missionaries are all, like the Founder, of the female sex. The present High Priestess in this country is a Mrs. Julia Field-King. Under her guidance and inspiration the faith has made remarkable strides. In November last the Scientists opened a tabernacle in Bryanston-street, Hyde Park. Here services of a sort are held on Sundays and at other times, and the elect gather and compare notes. They belong exclusively, for a reason which will be indicated presently, to the well-to-do and (ostensibly) educated classes. Women predominate, but men are found among them, though I have not heard that any male neophyte has yet been found worthy of admission to the ministry. The temple is a showy and well-furnished building, and, like the congregation, suggests that Christian Science is in no immediate danger of perishing for want of funds. The same impression is conveyed by Mrs. Field-King's consulting room and residence at Kensington Palace Mansions, where, in company with several of her lady colleagues, she occupies a sumptuously appointed suite of rooms, with a black servant to open the door. Here Mrs. Field-King receives patients, visitors, and seekers after knowledge, and here, a few weeks back, she was kind enough to divulge a few of the mysteries of the Science to a representative of Truth. The cash requisite for the maintenance of the temple and the priestesses is derived solely from the fees paid by patients for Christian Science treatment, or for initiation into the mysteries of Metaphysical Healing. Wide as is the gulf which separates the Christian Scientist from the old medical practitioner, they are at one on the sacred question of fees. Mrs. Field-King makes no secret about this. The present professional scale of remuneration for a Christian Science practitioner is 8s. for the first consultation ("demonstration" is, I believe, the technical name for it), and 4s. afterwards. In addition to this, it is, I believe, necessary for the patient to purchase a copy of the sacred book of Mary G. Eddy, at the price of 14s. Treatment is also said to be carried on by correspondence, but on what terms I cannot say. The most lucrative source of revenue, however, is the initiation of disciples into the mysteries of the new Science, which is effected by class lectures at a fee of twenty guineas the course. When I mention that Mrs. Field-King informed my representative that she had at present about seventy pupils, representing fees to the amount of 1,400 guineas, it will be seen that whatever Christian Science may do for the sick and suffering, it is doing uncommonly well for its own votaries. It may, perhaps, occur to the reader that there is something here rather different from the conditions under which the Gospel miracles were performed, and the first disciples of Christianity instructed. Mrs. Field-King recognises this, but has the Scriptural quotation, "The labourer is worthy of his hire," ready for any caviller. She also professes to believe that the exaction of fees on the above scale as the price of treatment is fully warranted by Biblical precedent; and she appeals to the "bag" carried by Judas Iscariot as evidence that fees were taken from those on whom the Gospel miracles were wrought. I say that she "professes" to believe this, for I decline to admit that a lady of more than average intelligence can have imposed upon herself by this blasphemous misinterpretation of Scripture, whatever she may have done to her dupes. Anyhow, the fact is clear that the Gospel according to Eddy is a Gospel primarily designed for those who are blessed with this world's goods; and if Lazarus, with his sores, should ever seek relief at the temple of "Christian Science," he will have to sit out on the pavement in Bryanston-street.

With these general observations on the methods of Mrs. Field-King and her friends, let us now see Christian Science at work. Some months back, I believe in 1896, an old lady, whom we will call Lady X, fell under the influence of the Christian Scientists. She was at the time eighty-seven years of age, and is described as a "splendid old woman, with a constitution of iron." She was, however, nearly stone-deaf, and for this the Christian Scientists undertook to treat her. She seems to have been under this treatment for some ten months. Her relatives felt anxious as to the result, but were powerless to interfere. At last a message was sent from her household to one of her relatives, announcing that she was in a critical condition. Lady X was at that time being regularly attended by a healer from Mrs. Field-King's head-quarters. On learning her condition, the gentleman who got the message took steps to bring on to the scene an eminent West End doctor, who had been in the habit of attending Lady X; and at the same time he sent his daughter to interview the Christian Science lady, and represent to her the seriousness of the situation. The Christian Scientist professed to have no fear; but on its being represented to her that in case Lady X died there would be no one to certify, and that a coroner's inquest must follow, she went off in search of Mrs. Field-King, who, she stated, was a qualified medical practitioner. Mrs. Field-King came back with her colleague very shortly, but seems to have hesitated to get mixed up in any unpleasantness; and, having received her fees, took her departure. Before she did so, however, she stated that she was a certified doctor, and qualified to give death certificates. I may here remark that, when subsequently questioned on this point, she professed to be in ignorance of the English law, and said that she would consult her solicitor about it. The Christian Scientists having cleared out, material science in the person of the regular medical attendant took possession, when it was found that Lady X was in a most deplorable condition, purely through the stupid folly of the people who had been attending her. The old lady had been accustomed to use drugs or mineral waters regularly, and the Christian Scientist had undertaken to replace them with metaphysical mind-healing, with results which may be imagined. The natural functions of the body had been absolutely suspended for seven days. The poor woman lay on her back moaning in agony, half unconscious, and apparently at the very point of death. Medical help arrived too late, and she expired very shortly. How much money the Christian Scientists obtained for her treatment from first to last does not seem to have been ascertained; but I can state that long before the end of the case Mrs. Field-King received one cheque for twenty-seven guineas, as I have the document in my possession, with Mrs. Field-King's endorsement upon it.

The foregoing case illustrates in the most convincing manner the dangers incidental to this pernicious combination of religious cant and medical quackery. The separation of the "patient" from the control and advice of relatives and friends, the substitution for these influences of the ascendency of strangers whose chief object is mercenary, the withholding of proper medical treatment in illness possibly of a dangerous character, all these are necessary incidents of the system which Mrs. Field-King and her colleagues practise. How many cases similar to that described above have occurred one can only conjecture. In the United States, where the imposture is also flourishing, criminal charges have been preferred against the Science healers in consequence of the death of patients; though from a mistaken tenderness for their religious or "conscientious" tenets, I believe that no conviction has yet been obtained against them. In England I have heard of cases in which those who have fallen under the influence of the Christian Scientists have become estranged from their friends, who have suffered in consequence the keenest anxiety. I also hear of a case in which serious differences have arisen between husband and wife from the same cause. In all human probability there have been others in which irreparable mischief has been done by the deprivation of proper medical treatment. In all these instances the Christian Scientists have, of course, taken their toll from the purses of their victims. From what is already known on the subject of faith-healing, one would have supposed that these people would be able to point in their defence to striking cases of cures effected by their agency. It is true that at their meetings they talk of such cases, and in a vague way references to apparently miraculous cures, including the healing of broken limbs, are made in

Mrs. Eddy's volume. But one of the strongest points which the Westminster Gazette writer recently made against them was that he had been unable to obtain from any one connected with the Christian Science propaganda any authentic particulars of cures; and in corroboration of this, I find that in her interview with my own representative, when Mrs. Field-King discoursed at some length on the ethics of her method, she made no attempt to anticipate hostile criticism by furnishing particulars of patients who have been successfully treated by her.

From this it would appear that Christian Science is not only a more extravagant and pretentious, but also a more empty and delusive form of quackery than anything which has preceded it in the same line. The "Peculiar People" have done harm enough in their way, but no one doubts that, misguided fanatics though they are, they are at least sincere in profession and honest in practice. They may have been guilty of manslaughter, but they have never been charged with obtaining money by false pretences. The disciples of Mrs. Eddy combine a similar form of medico-religious quackery with undisguised designs upon the pockets of their victims. Those who are weak in mind as well as in body are likely to prove absolutely helpless in their hands, and it is hardly an exaggeration to say that the weakest class of victims stand in danger of losing their money first and their lives afterwards. This is a sufficiently alarming prospect, and I think it will be held to justify the warning which I have now given.

DUBLIN CASTLE IN CEYLON.

A good deal is said from time to time in condemnation of the incongruous union of judicial and executive authority in the same hands in India. It is doubtful, however, whether the system there, pernicious though it be, is in the long run so pernicious as the system which has grown up in Ceylon. The magistracy of the colony are nominally in a position of independence, but practically they are bound hand and foot to the Executive Government, unable to express an opinion or to give a decision without considering whether it will meet with the approval of various official superiors. In some recent issues of the Ceylon Standard a writer signing himself "Vetus"—a lawyer well qualified to speak on the question—has given an account of the remarkable measures that have been adopted by the Government to watch and check the doings of the magistracy. Every magistrate is, it seems, virtually under the control or subject to the interference of the Inspector-General of Police, a police magistrate of Colombo, the Government or Assistant Government Agent of his district, the Colonial Office, and the Governor. The Inspector-General of Police has "to scrutinise the work of each magistrate and to report thereon to the Government;" so that he is in the anomalous position of having to state his views as to the competence or otherwise of the very men who are daily disposing of the charges and complaints preferred by his own subordinate officers and constables. It is as though Sir Edward Bradford were appointed superintendent of the London Stipendiaries. How this arrangement works out in Ceylon was shown some time ago, when a magistrate ventured to pass some severe but, as he believed, justifiable reflections upon the veracity of certain police witnesses. A circular was at once issued to all magistrates, forbidding the use of such language towards police officers. The objection to the supervision of the Inspector-General of Police applies equally to the practice of requiring the magistrates to furnish returns and reports to the Government Agents, who are, of course, constant litigants in their courts. One of the police magistrates of Colombo also exercises a sort of general control over the work of the other magistrates. They are further under the orders of the Colonial Office and the Governor. And, finally, to complete their subjection, they are liable to dismissal at a month's notice.

Nor is it only the inferior magistrates who are thus hampered and harassed in the discharge of their duties. The District Judges frequently receive memoranda from the Colonial Secretary curtly requesting them "to report" to him upon some decision they have given. Last year, indeed, the Colonial Secretary went a step further than this, actually instructing the District Judge of Colombo to follow a certain procedure in a case which was about to be tried. On another occasion last year Mr. Cameron, then District Judge of Kandy, animadverted upon the conduct of the military authorities in refusing at first to comply with an order for the payment to a judgment creditor of some money which they held belonging to the judgment debtor. There was a right of appeal to the Supreme Court against the Judge's order in the matter, but the military authorities preferred to go to the Governor, and the Governor, without troubling to hear what Mr. Cameron had to say in justification of his remarks, actually wrote a letter, "apologising on behalf of the Public Service for the language used by the District Judge." It would be hard to imagine a proceeding more unfair to the Judge himself, and at the same time better calculated to bring the administration of justice into contempt. People are not likely to care much for the authority of Judges who are snubbed in this way by the head of the Government; and his Excellency's own admission in his letter that he was "advised that he could not interfere with the judicial discretion or judicial functions of a Judge," makes his conduct all the more inexcusable and scandalous. His uncalled-for "apology" was, of course, really a means of doing indirectly that which, as he acknowledged, he had no right to do directly. The fact is that in Ceylon it is only the Supreme Court whose independence is respected by the Executive Government, and in that case it is respected only because the attempts of former Governors to interfere with its discretion were warmly repulsed. The present Governor, Sir West Ridgeway, has taken care not to lay himself open to the well-deserved rebuffs which two of his predecessors received from the Supreme Court. But, on the other hand, he has tightened up the Executive fetters for the minor judiciary, and improved upon the methods he learned during the Coercion régime at Dublin Castle. To quote from the correspondent I have previously mentioned, Sir West Ridgeway evidently conceives it to be his duty "to control and guide and influence the judiciary of the island." Accordingly, every magistrate is now required to surrender his discretion to the Governor or somebody appointed by him. Such a state of affairs is destructive of all confidence in the administration of justice. To ensure that confidence, one of the first essentials is that those who administer the law shall be above even the suspicion of allowing any external influence to affect their decisions. But how can impartiality and independence of judgment be expected from magistrates who are known to be under the orders, and more or less at the mercy, of half a dozen different executive officers with the Governor at their head? A system such as that at present in vogue in Ceylon is certain to lead to abuses, and it would be well for the Secretary of State for the Colonies to give his attention to it before it leads to worse scandals than those which have already occurred.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

PARIS CONVALESCENT.

I DARE say that the Russian alliance is safe and sound, but the Russian fever has run its course, and Paris is convalescent. Were not this so, the Russian concerts got up by Lamoureux, at the Cirque d'Été, must have drawn enthusiastic multitudes. The programmes were enticing; the object in view was that of aiding different interesting French institutions, such, for instance, as the General Association of Students of Paris: but most of the seats were empty, unless just at the outset. Yet the orchestral bâton was wielded by M. de Kosatchenko, leader of the Imperial Opera House of St. Petersburg, a State institution, on which roubles are lavished, and not in vain He came with his choristers round him. The favourite contralto singer, Mme. Gorlinko Dorlino, was in the company, and a prodigy of eight or nine, whom the Parisians call Rubinstein junior. Leader, chorus, contralto, and prodigy were each a great success. Mme. Gorlinko Dorlino has a lovely voice, sweet as honey and rich and round. She is quite as sweet herself, and has the prettiest and most winning manners imaginable. But the fever being over, and Russian music being crowded out of French ears by Italian, German, and French masters, they could not appreciate Glinka, Ivanoff, Dargonijsky, Tschaïkowsky, Solowieff, and so on. A number of journalists had remembered how the Czar almost blistered his hands applauding Mme. Gorlinko Dorlino at the Peterhof concert given in compliment to M. Félix Faure. Those who heard her at the Cirque d'Été did not wonder; but they did not care to hear again a long concert exclusively devoted to Russian music. The Jews, who are great patrons of music, also stood aloof. They are scarcely enthusiasts about anything Russian, not excepting the Alliance.

The leading personages of the official world, however, attended. At last Saturday's concert I saw the Minister of Public Instruction and M. Jules Claretie. M. Hanotaux and a number of his Quai d'Orsay subordinates dropped in. Mme. Carnot was in a box facing the stage. She came accompanied by a lady whose natural function seemed to be that of accompanist. Mme. Carnot was in a black gown and capote bonnet with a good deal of white, a large white feather and aigrette, with white strings, and white plastron and a full cravat and collarette of white lace. A few evenings previously I saw her at the German Embassy in a very elegant black and heliotrope toilette. Prince Troubetskoy, with a lady in crimson velvet, was in a contiguous box, and General Fredericks, the Russian military attaché, with Baroness Fredericks, were behind him. Mme. Carnot warmly applauded the contralto cantatrice. So did every one else. But the Russians only seemed to care for the instrumental music and the choruses. Mme. Gorlinko, whom I have met in private, was in a pink brocade dress made high. Her wraps were luxurious. A mantle of light yellowish-green satin was lined with rich and flexible fur, and her head and neck muffled with a scarf of white Alençon point. Every lady is the age she looks. This singer being fresh, fair, and comely, might be any age from twenty-five to thirty-five. She has a countenance that best expresses light gaiety and amiable and sentimental moods. The complexion is one to go with auburn hair. As a matter of fact, Mme. Gorlinko's very beautiful hair is light brown shot with gold, and has shades the dyer's art is impotent to give. Her laughter is a pleasing, soft ripple; her manners are quite natural, and those of a thoroughly well-bred woman who has ancestors. In short, they are easy and graceful.

I fancy one ought first to hear Glinka and the other composers named above, during a long residence in Russia, to understand them in Paris. It seems to me that I never understood Italian music, though brought up on it, until I went to Italy. It was the same with Italian painting. Each country has its own æsthetic instincts. To be in touch with them one should understand the conditions that produced them. There is much to admire in Russia. The sky, the birch and pine forests, the snow effects, have a beauty of their own. But each effect is marred by monotony. One drives furiously to escape from the monotonous scenery. There is little variety in earth or sky for the six winter months. The monotonous heat of the houses is most depressing. Without cards, tea, and stronger drinks, life would be unbearable. Nature is overpowering. She has few smiles. There is no spring as we understand it, only a sloppy, sludgy thaw of a few days, immediately followed by fierce summer heat. All this explains the oft-recurring minor key in Russian music, and that long-continued plaintiveness that gets on French nerves. It affects them like "the tune the old cow died of."

I chatted at the Cirque d'Été with a French journalist who has just come back from Russia. He is also the proprietor of a great provincial newspaper, and his manners smack of his province. Nothing could be more frank than his talk. The Southern is frank even when trying to deceive. My interlocutor of the Cirque d'Été has a mind made up on most subjects. Naturally, it is impervious to foreign influences. I shall not say that it is stuffed with French prejudices, though one might do truthfully. He went to St. Petersburg to see the reception of M. Félix Faure. "Were you pleased with it?" I asked. "Yes, and No." "What was the matter with it?" "They managed to drop on every occasion the word Republic, and to treat the excellent Félix not as a President, but un roi pour rire. It all seemed pire qu'une comédie—une bobêcherie." How translate this "But is not Russia a great country?" "In size and military strength. But she is so backward in every other way. Everything is of a piece with that poor music we have been hearing—music good enough for seaside casinos, but without any high inspiration or other great quality. That 'Vie pour le Tsar' of Glinka is childish—I was going to say degoûtant, but must not risk so strong an expression. The 'Vive la France' Cantata, which you will presently hear, is the trickiest thing that ever was. The author was at a world of pains not to offend courtly ears with the word President or Republic. Félix—a paid functionary—is 'the Chief of noble France.'" "But the word President, you will own, does not lend itself to musical numbers. It is really too hard a word for a librettist to manage." "Perhaps; but you will also own that on so great an occasion it was his business to overcome the difficulty. Les Russes nous roulent. As diplomats we are not their match. The most striking effect of the alliance has been to make M. Faure imagine himself a potentate. Everything at the Elysée is now on the Court footing, and every one on the high horse. When waiting for dinner to be announced, one must not speak unless spoken to by the President. The officers of the military household assume in his presence the attitude of humble servants, and are almost disdainful of the second-class guests. One remembers with sorrow Grévy's military secretary, the amiable and obliging General Pittie. The solemnity is crushing. Tongues usually are untied in the smoking-room, but not now at the Elysée. One is dying to yawn or to s'esquiver à l'anglaise. But an officer eyes one, and is ready to frown down any such breach of manners. The protocol forbids any dinner guest of the President going away before the latter has retired to his private apartments. Think of the mortal ennui of an evening spent in solemn silence—and in a palace that was brightened by the wit of Thiers and the delightfully clever talk of Grévy!"

One of the sights in Paris during Easter is the Restaurant Durand at the Madeleine. Talk about Easter eggs! Go and taste the "œufs à la Meyerbeer" at Durand's and you will bless me for telling you.

In reading the above make allowance for Southern exaggeration and warm Republican feeling. Still I am afraid the President must have English blood in his veins. He loves a sovereign or a grand nobleman as thoroughly as though he were an Englishman. He has also an English middle-class passion for respectability and pompous forms. This will make his approaching visit to the Riviera a source of delight. I do hope he will have an opportunity of studying the Prince of Wales's manners with "inferiors." He has ordered six straw hats in London for Riviera wear. They are of the yachtsman's model. The King of the Belgians' yacht will be at Villa Franca when M. Faure is at Cimiez, and there are many yachts of American railway kings and other such royalties lying about. As ladies do not count in the protocol, M. Faure will go en garçon to the Riviera. He will also go incognito, the better to recruit after an attack of influenza.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE memory recoils to a quarter of a century ago, dear Lady Betty, at the announcement that Arthur Orton, the Claimant to the Tichborne title and estates, is dead. In the early seventies the attention of the whole English-speaking race was riveted upon this Wapping butcher, whose pretensions it required the combined talent of the British Bar to upset. What a multitude of names, famous or notorious, cluster around that memorable criminal! Chief Justice Bovill, Sir Alexander Cockburn, Lord Coleridge, Lord Bowen, Mr. Serjeant Parry, Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, Dr. Kenealy, Mr. Guildford Onslow, Mr. Whalley, The O'Gorman—whose names were household names at that period—are dead: the Bella suggests little or nothing to the present generation: Wagga-Wagga has faded into insignificance; and the catch-phrase, "Would you be surprised to hear?" has so far relaxed its grasp upon the memory that even the Times leader-writer misquotes it! Still, some remember the time when even the most ordinary sentence was prefaced by this irritating question, and fewer recollect the celebrated music-hall song which contained these rhymes:—

"Now would you be surprised to hear
That I am going to sing?
But nowadays there's nobody Surprised at anything"—

a sentiment which is repeatedly expressed to-day as if the conduct of the present generation had given especial occasion for it.

"Now would you be surprised to hear
Her Majesty the Queen
Among her loyal subjects
Now is daily to be seen?
And would you be surprised to hear,
When foreign princes call
At Buckingham's fair palace
There is room enough for all?"— questions which show that in these respects a quarter of a century has brought about remarkably little change. The actors who occupied the stage of life when we were young are rapidly being replaced, and the giants and the memorable events of our youth seem, the former pigmies and the latter trifling, to the new generation!

* * * * *

Mr. Curzon, the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, has, to the great surprise of every diplomatist, defined the duties of the members of the Diplomatic Service as being mainly concerned with reporting "facts of which they have official cognisance." Mr. Curzon has only to refer to the archives of the Foreign Office to learn that his definition is altogether erroneous. A diplomatist is all eyes, ears, and good manners; and the latter quality is very necessary to enable him to make the best use of those inquisitive organs. The duty of a diplomatist is to foresee events by the light of the most trifling circumstances, and to inform his Government of his forecast, and of the incidents which have led to his making it, as speedily as possible. In this matter a diplomatist does not differ from a journalist, except that the information of the former is for official consumption, whilst that of the latter is retailed to the public. For many years it has been repeatedly insisted upon in these columns that the great fault in Lord Salisbury's government of the Foreign Office is that he is not in touch with his subordinates. The punishment for that fault is obviously that he is not as well-informed as he should be.

* * * * *

An expert, whose reputation stands very high as an authority upon the subject in question, has done me the honour of addressing the following letter to me:—

"Sir,—A portion of the French Press has been exulting at what they believe to be the exposed condition of this country, now that the Channel Fleet is at Gibraltar. As several English newspapers have echoed this cry by raising the invasion scare, it may not be inopportune to throw a little light upon the matter.

"The term 'Channel Fleet' is somewhat misleading; for the duties of the fleet which is so called have nothing to do with the Channel or with home defence. Detached Fleet would better describe it, since its duties are to go anywhere to any waters where an accession of strength may be required; and, in fact, it has no definite cruising area.

"But there is a Fleet the existence of which seems to be entirely overlooked. It is at home, in commission, and ready to repel any attack. It is constituted as follows:—

Nile, Trafalgar, Howe, Admiral class. Collingwood, " " Rodney, " " } First-class battleships, any one of them superior to any French ship afloat.

Colossus, Thunderer, } Second-class battleships of very considerable offensive and defensive power.

Conqueror Hero } Third-class, or small battleships of considerable fighting power, but wanting in coal endurance.

Alexandra.—Third-class battleship of but moderate fighting power, but a good sea boat.

Galatea Australia } First-class armed cruisers.

Melampus.—Second-class cruiser.

And numerous torpedo-gunboats, and also twelve torpedo-boat destroyers.

"All the above, with the exception of the Alexandra, are armed with powerful modern breech-loading and also quick-firing guns.

"It should be mentioned that Collingwood has gone into dock to get rid of rats, with which she is infested, but she would always be available at a few hours' notice.

"Terrible is at home, and in commission, but as she is intended for specific duties she cannot be counted as belonging to the Reserve Fleet.

"The Reserve Fleet also contains two other ships, Benbow and Sanspareil, which are usually classed as first-class battleships; but as their armament is of too heavy a character to render them valuable in a fleet action they have been omitted from the above list.

"In addition to those which have been named, which form the Reserve Fleet, and are all in commission, we have at home the following vessels, every one of them modern, and most of them the very best of their class:—

"Two, first-class battleships; two, second-class battleships; seven, first-class cruisers; twenty, second-class cruisers; several third-class cruisers and torpedo gunboats; and about thirty torpedo-boat destroyers. All of these are practically ready for commission.

"It should be remembered that the above lists are exclusive of all obsolete ships; all cruisers which, by reason of their coal consumption, are cramped in their range, and all ships that are not absolutely available.

"As against this, the French have in northern waters:—

"Hoche, first-class battleship; four ships of the Valmy class, i.e., small coast-defence ships, which can only fight in smooth waters, are of very small coal capacity, and—although intended to be otherwise—of very low speed; one fairly good first-class cruiser; one very bad first-class cruiser; and two second-class cruisers.

"There are also many obsolete and useless ships in reserve; also about ten modern second-class cruisers, all wanting in coal endurance.

"Entrecasteaux—a very important ship—which is now going through her trials, is not included in the above list, as it is the function of our Terrible to specially look after her.

"Russia has all her cruisers in Chinese waters. She has in the Baltic one battleship, two coast-defence ships, and a few obsolete and useless vessels.

"Both France and Russia have many important ships approaching completion, but not available at the present time. "Nauticus."

The unexpected death of Lady Glenesk has occasioned general regret, for the late Lady Glenesk had many friends belonging to every shade of party politics, in the ranks of literature, music, and art, and in general society both in Great Britain and abroad. The name of the late Lady Glenesk will for long be remembered in history, as it was she who first proposed that women should be associated with the now memorable Primrose League.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

LORD CAWDOR was for many years a member of the Jockey Club, but he rarely attended the meetings, and some time ago he resigned. He won some races twenty years ago with Mavis, a mare purchased by him as a yearling for a small sum, and he afterwards sold her to his intimate friend, the late Lord Falmouth, for whom she bred Galliard, winner of the Two Thousand in 1883, and this horse would have won the Derby and St. Leger if he had gone on all right. Lord Cawdor also won races with King Duncan, Brioche, Witchcraft, and Perdita II., a mare bred by himself, who is now in the Prince of Wales's stud at Sandringham, and better known as the dam of Florizel II. and Persimmon than through her own very moderate performances on the Turf. Lord Cawdor was an owner of the best type, who never betted, but raced solely for sport.

Several weeks ago I stated that The Baker certainly would not run for the Metropolitan Handicap at Epsom, and that it was then the intention of Sir John Kelk to start his colt for the Chester Cup, but that it was exceedingly probable that in the end The Baker would be reserved for Ascot. One of the sporting papers thereupon insisted that Sir John Kelk's colt would run at Epsom, but The Baker has now been struck out of both his handicap engagements, and his owner is very wise in deciding to have him specially prepared for the Ascot Cup. If the going is good at Ascot The Baker might just as well be started for the Queen's Vase on the first day of the meeting, as he would have no extra weight to carry in that race, and a victory would not involve any penalty for the Cup. So far as I remember, the last horse which won both Vase and Cup was Verneuil in 1878.

I see it is stated that Velasquez has improved so much since last season that he is expected to give Galtee More a good deal of trouble in the Ascot Cup. Valasquez has greatly improved in all respects during the winter, and he bids fair in a few weeks to be a really magnificent four-year-old, but the notion that he will be found to have developed from a miler into a Cup horse is extravagantly and insanely chimerical. As a matter of fact, Velasquez is not engaged in the Ascot Cup, so he cannot meet Galtee More in that race. Last season Velasquez plainly demonstrated on more than one occasion that he cannot stay beyond an easy mile, and under the circumstances it would have been desperate fauity to have trained him this year for any long-distance race, as he would have lost his fine speed without gaining any more stamina. Velasquez will undergo a special preparation for the three £10,000 races, and there are many people who expect that Lord Rosebery's horse will follow in the steps of Isinglass in 1894 and sweep the board of these events. In the Princess of Wales' Stakes Velasquez holds all the four-year-olds safe enough, excepting only his stable companion Chelandry, to whom he has to give 6 lb. Minstrel, Goletta, and Berzak have no chance of defeating Lord Rosebery's horse, and Vesuvian cannot be trained again. The danger to Velasquez will lie in the three-year-olds, the best including Dieudonné and Ninus of the so-called "cracks" of the season, while among the maidens are Brio, Collar, Isabinda (sister to St. Frusquin), and The Wyvern. I do not believe that Velasquez would have any pretensions to give a stone more than weight for age to any smart three-year-old.

The acceptance for the Eclipse Stakes is really a second edition of the Princess of Wales's entry, except that Chelandry's name is not to be found in the list, nor is Brio engaged. Ninus has also been left out of this race, but Dieudonné is entered, and the Duke of Westminster has left in both Batt and Collar. M. Ephrussi's Margaux, by War Dance out of Madeira (dam of Alicante), might be a dangerous candidate, but there is no maiden allowance in the Eclipse Stakes, and Velasquez has to carry 10 lb. extra.

In the Jockey Club Stakes Lord Rosebery has both Velasquez and Chelandry, and Margaux is also in this race, having 17 lb. the best of the weights with Lord Rosebery's horse, as he is blessed with both breeding and maiden allowances. However, I fully expect that Cyllene will win the last of this year's £10,000 stakes if he has any pretensions to be regarded as a good horse, for he will have only 3 lb. extra to carry, thanks to a double breeding allowance.

Lord Rosebery has entered Chelandry for the Ascot Cup, but, on the St. Leger running, she can have no chance whatever of defeating Galtee More, if Mr. Gubbins' horse has trained on all right. My own opinion is that the danger to last year's Derby winner will come from Cyllene and The Baker.

Velasquez is engaged at Ascot only in the Rous Memorial Stakes, but he will not run until the Newmarket First July Meeting. Velasquez and Galtee More might meet at even weights in the Champion Stakes at the Second October Meeting, a race which was won last year very easily indeed by Lord Rosebery's horse, who made a grievous show of Bay Ronald.

Calder was an excellent jockey, and during the last four seasons he had ridden with great success, having steered 272 winners in that time. He rode a very fine race when he won the Cambridgeshire of 1888 on Veracity, who finished a head only in front of Cactus, and in the following year he was successful on the same horse in the Liverpool Summer Cup and in the Chesterfield Cup at Goodwood. He never rode any other important winner, except the Prince of Wales' Florizel II. in the Manchester Cup of 1895. Calder was a thoroughly capable rider and a powerful horseman. He was a capital judge of pace, and never lost his head in a ding-dong finish, nor did he ever commit the direful blunder of easing his horse until the winning post had been fairly passed. He had been for the last eighteen months first jockey to Sir Blundell Maple, who was most kind and considerate to him during his illness. He has died just when the prospects of the stable are beginning to improve, and he could reasonably look forward to winning his first "classic" race on Royal Footstep.

I stated several weeks ago that the Duke of Devonshire contemplates reserving Dieudonné for the Derby, instead of starting the colt for his Newmarket engagements, which are the Column Stakes, the Two Thousand, and the Newmarket Stakes. This will be sound policy, not only because Dieudonné wants time, but also as it is certain that the Epsom gradients will suit the Duke's steed very much better than the R.M. at Newmarket. I hear that the Duke of Devonshire intends to run Carhaix for the Two Thousand, the colt being nominated for that race by his late owner, M. Lebaudy. Carhaix won his race at Liverpool very easily indeed, and he can be much improved before April 27, to which it may be added that he is at least sure to stay the course, which is more than can be said for most of the other probable starters. The Egerton Lodge stable may also be represented in the Two Thousand by Jeddah (by Janissary out of Pilgrimage, dam of Canterbury Pilgrim), a colt owned by Mr. Larnach, but his running will depend upon whether he wins his engagement at Newmarket next week.

I have always been of the opinion that Ninus will beat Hawfinch whenever they again meet, but Prince Soltykoff's horse had better be left alone for the present, as it is by no means certain that he can be properly fit to run for such a race as the Two Thousand in three weeks. Ninus has certainly not been hurried on in his work, and I fancy he is being trained with a view to his winning the Grand Prix on June 5 rather than his English engagements. We have yet to learn that Ninus can stay the R.M., and it is the same with Disraeli, who has recovered from his recent accident. Mr. W. Johnstone's horse will be quite fit to run, as he is not an animal that needs much work. It is certain that if Mr. W. Johnstone is to carry off this year's Two Thousand or Derby it is Disraeli that will be the winner, for the prospect of the much-written-up Angus standing a preparation is forlorn in the extreme. Galashiels, King of Thebes, and Florio Rubattino ought all to win races in the course of the season, but neither of them is likely to be found up to Two Thousand or Derby form, even in such a moderate year as this promises to be. Lord Durham who has been in Egypt for several months, went last week to Newmarket to see Gerolstein gallop, but this dark colt has not a 1,000 to 1 chance for any of the big races, and if the ground gets hard he will be a difficult animal to train. Gerolstein, who is by St. Serf out of Geraldine, cost 2,600 gs. as a yearling, and I fear his owner's prospects of getting back his outlay on this animal are dismally remote. Orzil will do very well while the ground is soft, but directly dry weather sets in it will be all up with him. I do not believe that Mr. Brassey's colt can stay beyond five furlongs. The money invested so recklessly on Ormathwaite during the winter is hopelessly lost, for there is no chance of the Prince of Wales's colt running for either the Two Thousand or Derby, and he will probably be turned out of training in a few weeks.

The Prince of Wales is to be at Newmarket next week, when he will doubtless decide which race Sandringham is to go for. This is the two-year-old brother to Persimmon, and he is a very fine colt, being indeed one of the best-looking and most racing-like animals now in training. Sandringham is in the £3,000 race at Kempton Park on May 6, and in the Woodcote Stakes at Epsom on May 24. It would be good policy to try and win one of these events with Sandringham, and then run him for the Coventry Stakes at Ascot, in which race there are no penalties. Sandringham's half-sister by Surefoot, the three-year-old Azeeza, will probably be turned out of training, and relegated to the Prince's stud before long, as she is never likely to do any good on the Turf. With Ormathwaite's forelegs so "groggy" that it is in the highest degree improbable that he will ever stand training, it would seem that the Prince of Wales will have to depend on his two-year-olds this season, and the best of them, after Sandringham, longo intervallo, is Eventail, by Ayrshire out of Fanchette (dam of Mousme), who will probably win a race in the course of the next few weeks. Eventail is in the £200 Plate at Newmarket next Thursday, and if she starts she may very likely carry off this race.

The Duke of Devonshire's best two year-old is the colt by Morion out of Lady Yardley (dam of Disraeli), which was bought at Doncaster out of the Sledmere team for 680 gs. This animal will probably make his debut in the May Plate at the First Spring Meeting. The Duke has a half-brother to Balsamo, by Melanion, that will most likely run for the £3,000 race at Kempton Park next month.

The great dash at Derby was on Lord Carnarvon's two year-old Dark David, in the Osmaston Plate. The colt was declared to be a certainty, and the very slightest shade of odds was freely accepted in a field of ten by infatuated plungers. There must have been some egregious blundering about Dark David's trial, or else the running was all wrong, for the colt utterly failed to stay, being palpably dead beat before half a mile had been traversed. Fokien, a good looking colt by Westminster, won very easily for Wadlow, who must have galloped this animal to his satisfaction, considering the generous manner in which he was backed at outside prices. There were only three starters for the Doveridge Handicap of £1,000! This race resulted in a crash for backers, as liberal odds were freely betted on Melange, whereas Bellevin won in a common canter. This horse has a disastrous habit of bringing plungers to grief, and many people must still have a dismally distinct recollection of his collapse in Ireland, when odds of 10 to 1 were betted on him. Wildfowler was not fit to run last week, so his defeat was nothing to cause surprise to any rational observer. He will not be fit to run for the Two Thousand.

There is a fearful amount of racing next week, Jockey Club meetings having been sanctioned at Kempton Park, Newcastle, Birmingham, Catterick Bridge, Bogside (Eglinton Hunt), and Windsor, in addition to the Newmarket Craven, which will be the only really important fixture of the week. In addition there are thirty-one steeplechase fixtures, including a great number of Hunt meetings, of which the most important is the West Norfolk Hunt Club gathering at East Winch (which will be patronised by the Prince of Wales) on Monday. There are sure to be large fields for the principal cross-country events at Manchester.

There are twenty-eight three-year-olds left in for the Biennial of £500 at Newmarket, one of the scratched lot being Ninus. I should fancy that Devon will win this race, as he ought to have come on since running at Liverpool, and he has no penalty for his success there. The Column Stakes is as absolute a certainty for Cyllene, if he runs, as it was two years ago for St. Frusquin. The Craven Stakes of £500, which is run over the rarely-used Ancaster Mile, will be the most important three-year-old race during the week, and the entry of fifty-nine includes Leisure Hour, Purser, Dunlop, Glatisant, Sir Hew, Sangrado, Galashiels, Devon, Jeddah, Cowl, Pheon, Orzil, and Cap Martin. I shall expect this race to be won by either Jeddah or Sangrado.

The Fitzwilliam Plate, which will be worth over £500, may fall to Allegory. There are no fewer than fifty-five entries for a Plate of £200, and Sister Angela or Eventail may be able to win. It is dangerous work to meddle with two-year-olds at this period of the season, and particularly at Newmarket.

Hermiston will not run for the Wood Ditton Stakes, and, in the certain absence of the Kingsclere colt, Carhaix, should be successful if he starts, or if he is kept for the Two Thousand then King's Messenger (who won a race at Lincoln) may take the prize.

Lord Suffolk was never prominent as an owner of racehorses, although many years ago (as Lord Andover) he owned some platers in conjunction with Lord Coventry, the late Lord Devon (then Lord Courtenay), Lord Howard (now Lord Effingham), and the late Duke of Newcastle (then Lord Lincoln). They were known as "the Romeo Lords," because they owned a very smart horse named Romeo, who represented the best plating form of the period, and he could always be relied upon as a successful "retriever" after a bad week. Lord Suffolk was a hard and clever rider, and in early life he won several steeplechases. As Steward of the Jockey Club he was a decided success, and in many ways he displayed much ability and sagacity during his three years of office. Lord Suffolk had a considerable literary faculty, and he wrote many excellent and entertaining articles on sporting affairs. He was a fine fisherman and an excellent shot. Lord Suffolk had latterly lived almost entirely at Charlton, his place near Malmesbury, which is a grand old Jacobean house, with charming gardens. Charlton was much before the public some forty years ago, when some of the best of the many fine pictures in the gallery there were cut out of their frames one night and stolen, and a considerable period elapsed before they were recovered. Lord Suffolk was a good practical agriculturist, and had always taken an active part in the management of his estates.

Mr. Sloane, a well-known Rugby football player in the West Country, contemplated matrimony, and when his intention became known a testimonial was suggested. The English Rugby Union sanctioned the proposal, provided that his own club made no grant to it. The presentation took the form of a suite of dining-room furniture, and the authorities of the Union blessed it. One English player gets plate and another furniture. A Welshman gets a little bit of freehold and there is a terrible rumpus. International matches are broken off, and the recipient of the villa residence is subjected to a mean and petty persecution. No one objects to Mr. Sloane's testimonial. He is heartily to be congratulated on his popularity. I believe, too, he has the good sense to be able to see rather more than one inch before his nose, and realises that the professional difficulty cannot be properly dealt with in the manner proposed by the Rugby Union. This august body has stultified itself by the entirely inconsistent attitude it has taken up in the cases of the Gould and Sloane testimonials. It is undoubtedly a serious matter that the conduct of the game in England is vested in a committee of men who hallow with their presence a testimonial to an Englishman, and at the same time indulge their vindictive spite against a Welshman who has created modern football, and done more for the popularity and development of the game than all the officials of the Union put together, their indefatigable honorary secretary, Mr. Rowland Hill, only excepted.

Goodness only knows why the Rugby Union selected Blackheath for the match with Wales. Certainly there was a large crowd, but the inconvenience of the situation is so great that it speaks well for football enthusiasm that some twenty thousand people were present. On the ground itself the arrangements were excellent. The turf was in fine condition, there was but little wind, and the sun only once or twice peeped from behind the clouds, so that the players were never dazzled. As for the game itself, it was certainly one of the best exhibitions that has been seen in international matches this season. People may complain that there was not sufficient passing, yet for an international match the combination was really good. When one side scores thrice and the other once from as pretty pieces of passing as one could wish to see, there is not much cause to complain. The Welsh three-quarters were certainly rather inaccurate, but they had plenty of resource, and the way in which Huzzey dropped a rather lucky goal when a fine chance of attack was spoiled by some muffing passing, showed a great deal of resource. The feature of the game was undoubtedly the long kicking of both teams. The Welshmen excelled in this department of the game. Their three-quarters frequently gained a lot of ground by their long punts into touch. It was then that the superiority of the home team showed itself. Their forwards were faster and stronger and soon got the ball out of danger. The Welsh pack could not hold them long enough to give their outsides a chance, nor did they break up quickly enough when the ball was out. The Welshmen so frequently punted instead of passing that it looked as though they did not like the gentle attentions of Royds, who darted on his opponents, and either collared his man or intercepted a pass in very neat fashion. Stout had, on the whole, little to do. Foulkes, who had been passed over in the Scotch match, was the hero of the day. Against Ireland he suffered from weak halves. There was no mistake about his strong attacking powers on Saturday. Twice the ball came to him when close to touch, and the way in which he swerved inwards and charged through his men was a treat to witness. He reminded one of Bolton. He was irresistible. Livesay and Rotherham played splendidly. The former was most effective. The two might have been playing together all the season so well were they together. Of the two, Livesay was, perhaps, the best, for Rotherham like Elliot, the Welshman, had a predilection for offside play that resulted in free kicks. The Welsh halves were rather disappointing. But then they had not only good men against them, but slightly inferior forwards. It was the forward play that was the weak spot of the Welshman. Scotch forwards would have kept the ball as tight as possible after getting the lead as Wales did. But the Welsh are so used to playing the open game that they cannot keep the ball in the scrum and be content with playing a slow, stolid game. Probably two better full backs have never been seen on the same field in the same match. Byrne is inclined to be slow, but he has great strength, and his kicking was splendid. Bancroft, the Welsh captain, delighted every one by his cool and tricky play at back. If he had made a mistake one would have said he was playing to the gallery, but he never failed, and thus showed his great capacity as a player. It was a most interesting game to watch. It is to be hoped that after this victory the English Rugby Union will show a more friendly attitude to Mr. Gould.

Negotiations are pending between the Oxford and Cambridge athletic clubs with regard to the inclusion of the weight and hammer in the University programme. Oxford has suggested: (i.) the substitution of a two hundred yard and half mile race; (ii.) the abolition of one event and the inclusion of the half mile; (iii.) the weight and hammer each to score a half point, and the half to be added. Cambridge has rejected the first proposal, and will consider the other two. Mr. Lees Knowles trusts that Old Blues will write expressing their views on the question to Mr. Carter, of Caius, the president, or to the Rev. J. H. Gray, of Queens', the trainer. At the present time it does seem rather anomalous that there should be two full blues for feats of strength, and only four for flat racing. Furthermore, the hammer, if not the weight, is, as a rule, such a poor performance that to give a man his full blue for it is like giving a man a blue for doing a quarter in fifty-four. Then, too, the rules under which the competitions take place differ from those of the A.A.A. If the arch in the hammer or the square in the weight were limited, these performances would be even worse than they are. Of course, there may be difficulties in the way of accepting the third proposition of Oxford. It would be said a half point would not be worth a blue. But a full blue might be given if a certain agreed standard were reached.

The responsibilities of parents are manifold, and the tendency of the times is to add to them. In a light-hearted way the Divisional Court has decided that a racing bicycle is a necessary for an infant. It was a case in which a youth was sued for the balance of a machine which he had bought by instalments. He ingenuously pleaded infancy, but in vain. The stern parent who dislikes cycling may find himself confronted with a bill for a son's or daughter's bicycle any day. He will have to meet his adversaries in the way. Machines are as much necessaries as bacon and butter. It was only the depressing political outlook that prevented cycling shares experiencing a strong rise when this decision was made known.

There was a record number of competitors for the Ten Miles Championship. Twenty-three started and nine finished. At the last lap three men, Robinson, Bennett and Barlow were close together. The first named eventually won easily as he put on a spurt that showed he had plenty of strength left. It was worthy of Bacon. The time for three miles was 15 minutes 20 seconds, which is generally fast enough for the Inter-University Sports. Robinson is a Northampton man, who has twice won the Cross-Country Championships. He is undoubtedly entitled to rank as one of the finest long distance runners there has ever been. Just now there are several school sports taking place. The St. Paul's Meeting was, as usual, well managed and well attended. In the hurdles, Bailey cut the school record and in the half he made a dead-heat with Barry, also in record time. He should make a good sprinter and give up long distances. At Dulwich, Powell showed considerable promise as a long distance runner, but he has a lot to learn.

I have received an interesting communication from a member of the Cyclist Tourist Club referring to the distribution by the council to the members of a handbook and lodging list. The circumstances are so peculiar that I must defer any further consideration of the subject until next week.

There was a large attendance at Glasgow to see the International Association game between England and Scotland. In the English team there were three amateurs, Oakley, Smith, and Wreford-Brown, and they all played up to their reputations. It was a great win for the English team. The forwards were in splendid form, and always made straight for goal. There was no dallying with the ball, and Smith, as usual in the centre, was most unselfish. The half-backs were much stronger than their opponents, and Forman headed the ball most cleverly. At back, Doyle was rather slow, but the whole English defence was very sound, especially in the second half, when the Scotch forwards pulled themselves together and looked like giving a lot of trouble. Owing to the smallpox epidemic Middlesbrough played Thornaby in the semi-final of the Amateur Cup with closed gates. They won, and the match must have been exciting. Brentford beat Ilford easily, and so won the London Cup for the first time. Sheffield United, without a full team, just beat Sunderland after a great game, and so kept head of the League.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—A change has come over the political outlook, and, as I anticipated, the Chinese difficulty is disappearing. On the other hand, the Spanish-American position has become very critical, and the question of war or peace is hovering in the balance. We have still, therefore, political markets, and quotations fluctuate from day to day with the outlook, according to the varying advices from the political centres.

The Warriors and the Stock Markets.

In the case of the Spanish-American dispute, the warriors so far appear to have the upper hand; and there is no blinking the fact that the United States Congress is inclined to break out within the next few days, and to enter with a light heart upon a struggle which, in the present temper of Spain, will not be exactly a military promenade. Whether, at the eleventh hour, either by mediation or by concessions, some settlement may be arrived at, it is impossible to say. But the markets have now practically discounted the outbreak of war on the Cuban question. I do not refer to Spanish bonds, which may yet have a much heavier fall, as victory must in the end lie with the United States; but American Railroad stocks, after a fresh reaction, appear now to be at the war-level, and, should war be declared, a further set-back on the first shock of the news would doubtless be recovered almost immediately. As regards the other departments, they should shake themselves free from a struggle between the United States and Spain, although the Money Market may be affected to some extent by further withdrawals of gold for New York. So far, nearly forty millions of dollars have gone to that destination. The Chinese question has entered a more satisfactory phase. That Russia would take possession of Port Arthur and Ta-lien-wan has been clear to intelligent lookers-on for a long time, and City men generally are pleased with the turn which events have taken during the last few days, viz., the demand made by Great Britain for fresh naval bases in China. A lease of the Port of Wei-hai-wei has already been granted under the influence of the naval demonstration in Chinese waters. Guarantees will thus be obtained for the future position of this country in the Far East, which is precisely what the City would like to see, and it is generally anticipated that whatever steps are taken will not lead to any friction with Russia. By the time this reaches my readers, moreover, they will be in possession of the official statements as made in the House of Commons, which will doubtless clear the air to a considerable extent. The West African question has evidently reached a more satisfactory stage, and it is understood that the negotiations between England and France have made very important progress. I am, therefore, confirmed in the view taken a week ago that, apart from the Spanish-American dispute, foreign politics are not likely to disturb the peace of the world at present, so that an excellent opportunity will be provided for investors to buy at a moderate level in many departments, and more particularly in the South African and West Australian mining sections. Home and Argentine Rails stand also in many cases at tempting prices, and as to American Rails, war or no war, they are bound to rise in three months' time to much higher prices than are now current.

London and Paris Exchange, Ltd., 24, Throgmorton-street, London, E.C. This Corporation is prepared to make Advances on Mining Shares, at 6 per cent. per annum, subject to a deposit of 20 per cent. Clients by this system save the heavy contangoes usually charged.

Money and Gilt-Edged Investments.

As usual at the end of the quarter, the purse-strings were tightened by the banks, partly for the purpose of what some of my confrères call "window-dressing." Rates have, however, since fallen away in anticipation of Government disbursements, the rate for short money being 2¼ to 2½ per cent., while three months' bank bills are being taken at 2⅞ per cent. It is not at present likely, however, that rates will fall away further, and the Money Market will doubtless stiffen in case of a declaration of war by the United States, as more gold will then have to go from London. A very satisfactory feature, although one by no means relished by the discount houses and brokers, is the complete control which the Bank of England now has of the Money Market. The new policy of taking a more active part in discount business, adopted by the central institution, is working exceedingly well from the point of view of the public interest, and it will probably in the long run make rather for cheaper than dearer money. Gilt-edged investment stocks have not recovered yet from their recent decline. On the contrary, British Corporation stocks and Colonial bonds are again easier. On the other hand, the new Chinese loan has improved, and instead of 2 discount it stands now at 1⅛ discount. The other Chinese issues are also slightly firmer, the Seven per Cent. Silver Loan at 102½, the Six per Cent. Gold Loan at 105, the Five per Cent. Gold Loan at 98½ xd. Japanese bonds, too, have hardened to 100½. The improvement in these loans is, of course, due to the more pacific outlook in the Far East, and should the guarantees already referred to be granted by the Tsung-li-Yamen, this would, doubtless, be considered as a factor making for a further recovery. The Greek loan is expected after Easter, and will, doubtless, be well received. Consols, after experiencing a sharp improvement, are lower, and for the new account stand at 111½. The relapse appears to have been caused chiefly by sales as a hedge against other commitments, while naturally the possibility of large gold withdrawals for the United States, in case of an outbreak of war, would temporarily depress the price of our premier security.

Home Rails.—A General Rally.

I expressed a week ago my opinion that, looking at the position of Home Rails, one could not help feeling surprised at the extreme dulness of this department. The war rumours naturally caused a temporary feeling of depression, and the make-up prices at the last settlement showed a fresh decline, which has, however, for the best part since been recovered. Provided that this country is not implicated in any war—and that appears most unlikely—there is no reason why Home Rails should be depressed. Even war between the United States and Spain would not affect our railways to any extent, and would rather tend to bring a great deal of business for war material, &c., to this country, while the struggle cannot be a lengthy one. On the other hand, the ever-recurring political scares should make investors anxious to place their money in such substantial Home securities as those of our leading railways. Notwithstanding the adverse atmospheric conditions during the week ending March 27, traffics have kept up pretty well, although, of course, passenger receipts suffered by the return of wintry weather. The week just finished, on the other hand, has brought us so pleasant a climatic change, that good returns are very generally to be anticipated, and it is not to be forgotten that a traffic increase of £456,000 has already been piled up for the present half-year, while the return of sunshine foreshadows excellent holiday traffics. Again, from the point of view of the yield on last year's figures, excellent investment purchases can be made. Thus Brighton "A" yield nearly 4 per cent., Coras (Caledonian Deferred Ordinary) 3¾ per cent., Midland Deferred 3 15/16 per cent., North Eastern, North Western, and Great Western from 3½ to 3⅝ per cent., Dover "A" 3½ per cent., Great Eastern 2⅞ per cent. As regards the last mentioned two stocks, the discrepancy in the yield again shows how favourably Dover "A" compare with Great Eastern, while both are highly progressive lines. The South Eastern, by the way, has now also a new racecourse at Folkestone to swell its returns, and last week's meeting there was evidently well attended. Folkestone is making rapid progress in popularity as a seaside resort, and I am told that all the leading hotels there are fully booked up for Easter. Dover "A" at anything like 109 are undoubtedly an excellent purchase, and so are Brighton "A" at the present quotation. I have frequently insisted that stock is getting more and more scarce in the Home Railway department, and this fact was brought home to operators by the backwardation of ½ which was paid on Brighton "A," while on Great Eastern there was a backwardation of ¼, which was also the case with North Western. Contangos, in fact, went off all round, that on Dover "A" being only ⅛, while Great Central "A" were arranged at "even." It is quite clear, therefore, that this is not a market for the "Bears" to take liberties with, as any clearing of the political horizon might bring about very sharp advances. Next to Brighton "A" and Dover "A," Coras, which are now quoted ex their dividend of 1 per cent., should offer the best opportunity of a progressive investment, as the Caledonian must very considerably benefit by the extraordinary animation in the shipbuilding trade on the Clyde. I have already stated my favourable view of Great Central 1894 Ordinary, which, as a lock-up, have hardly their equal at about 40. Again, Metropolitan Districts are specially adapted for a lock-up. The line is already doing remarkably well, and had a bumper traffic for the week ended March 27, showing an increase of £771, which brings up the total gain, so far, to £4,687. This increase is, no doubt, chiefly due to traffic gained from the country extensions, but it must be considered that the new and more important extensions are only now in course of construction. Central London Railway shares have shown great strength, and do not appear to have been at all affected by the temporary depression in other railway stocks, the fully-paid Ordinary being more especially in favour at 10¾, while the partly-paid Ordinary stand at 6½, the Deferred at 4¾, the Preferred at 1¾. The enormous possibilities of this line, as serving the best route in the Metropolis, render these shares a capital lock-up, the more so as they are in receipt of 3 per cent. interest during the construction of the line, and compare favourably with Waterloo and City Electric Railway stock, which stands at 136½, and is, therefore, at a premium of 36½ per cent., or upwards of 3½ premium per £10, that being the denomination of Central London shares.

The Yankee Market—War or Peace?

Unless any striking change should take place during the next few days, the arbitrament of war will doubtless be appealed to by the United States as against Spain. At the last, perhaps, efforts will be made by the European Powers and by the Pope to avert a conflict by friendly mediation, but unless Spain grants certain concessions, hostilities would appear to be imminent. It is a pity that Spanish pride cannot be induced to give way sufficiently to avoid war, which President McKinley certainly appears to have done his best to prevent. The Congress is in a fighting mood, and grave events are evidently impending. A fresh fall in the Wall-street market shows that operators there have made up their minds that war is inevitable, and the fact that quotations hardened somewhat in New York on Saturday—although the news was, if possible, still more critical—distinctly points to the view that present prices are really at war level. They show, as I explained last week, a fall of from $5 to $10 from the quotations that prevailed before the Maine disaster; while, on the other hand, traffics show remarkably well, and the prosperity of the United States has not so far been affected by all the warlike rumours. Whatever may be the result of the first encounters, there can be no doubt that in the end, and probably within a few months' time, victory must be with the Americans, and then we shall see such a boom in Yankee Rails as has perhaps rarely been witnessed. There remains the other alternative, viz., that war may be avoided. There is, unfortunately, little reason for anticipating so satisfactory an ending to the present complications, but should a settlement, if only temporary, be reached, the whole active list of American Rails would rise to a higher level than that from which it has fallen. This is, of course, so obvious that it would be useless to further discuss this eventuality, which appears, moreover, to be more than doubtful. What, on the other hand, is of the greatest importance is to arrive at some conclusion as to what would happen in the American market should war be declared. I mentioned last week the old saying, "that in the case of a war threatening you can buy stocks safely as soon as the first shot is fired." This should apply more particularly to the impending conflict, as its final issue cannot for a moment be doubtful. The Spaniards will have to carry on war far from the mother-country, while Cuba is within easy reach of the United States, which nation, therefore, has all the advantages of position. While the two countries may be pretty evenly matched as regards their navy, there is little doubt that the Americans would be able to throw a very considerable number of troops into Cuba at a very early period of the struggle, and that with their assistance the insurgents would make short work of the Spanish army in the island. Spain would, therefore, fight a losing battle, while her credit would be altogether destroyed, and her financial resources would hardly carry her longer than a few months, as against the unlimited financial resources controlled by the United States. When war breaks out there would probably be a sharp relapse in Wall-street, but the position has been so fully discounted that both "Bears" and "Bulls" would be at once on the warpath with purchases. It is no secret that large sums are awaiting investment in the United States, the owners of which are only seeking an opportunity to come in. Similarly, British and Continental buyers would be forthcoming to a very large extent, and directly the "Bears" saw prices moving up again we should witness a scramble on their part such as was seen in Wall-street only a week ago when prices rose from $4 to $8. I do not advocate large speculative purchases, but capitalists who can pay for all they buy would do well to effect their purchases either immediately before or after the outbreak of war. They will be certain to see all these shares very much higher in a few months' time, while there are purchases to be made now of dividend-paying securities on terms which have not been obtainable for a long time. I stated last week that Milwaukee, Louisville, Union Pacifics, Union Pacific Prefs., Southern Prefs., and Northern Pacifics might with advantage be locked up now to a moderate extent. I still hold this view, but I would give the preference to Louisville, Union Pacifics, and Union Pacific Prefs., as these have experienced a much more severe decline than, for instance, Milwaukee. Special attention should also be devoted to the stocks of the Canadian lines. An American war would no doubt cause large quantities of goods to be diverted to Canadian lines for export from the ports of the Dominion, thus avoiding the risk of capture by Spain. The Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk should, therefore, obtain a considerable accession of traffic, which should more than compensate them for any falling-off in goods exported or imported by the States. Both roads are doing exceedingly well, the Grand Trunk monthly statement for February showing a net gain of £17,565, while current traffics continue to show large increases over the past year. In sympathy with the American Market, Canadian Pacifics and Grand Trunks have receded from the top prices touched, Canadian Pacifics to 84, Grand Trunk First Prefs. to 67⅜, the Guaranteed to 74⅛; but these stocks would doubtless shake themselves free from the influence of Wall-street fluctuations, more especially if the rate war were over. Unfortunately, the conference has now been postponed until the 15th inst., and I am still of opinion that the managements of both roads deserve censure for their fighting proclivities.

Foreigners and South Americans—a Set Back.

The Paris Bourse has received some very sharp shocks of late, and it is surprising that it has stood them so well. There is, in the first instance, the trouble with the Coulisse, which is absolutely hors de combat, and will probably remain so, unless at the eleventh hour the Senate should save it from extinction. Equally serious is the collapse in Spanish, the fall during the last three weeks reaching twelve points. Spanish have always been very largely held in France, and are very actively dealt in on the Paris Bourse, so that enormous losses must have been incurred. Again, some of the leading French banking establishments have been propping up Spain for a long time, and if the last peg gives way now, Spain will never be able to retrieve her financial position, default staring her in the face. No wonder that quotations generally of the Paris favourites have given way, and a flat tone prevails in Turks, Italians, Rio Tinto, &c. I have always warned my readers not to speculate in these gambling counters, and have repeatedly expressed the view that to hold Spanish at over 60 was like sleeping on a volcano. The various war rumours have also affected South American stocks unfavourably, and the rally in these has therefore been short-lived. There is no fresh development of the boundary dispute between Chili and Argentina, but Argentine Government stocks have been kept back by the political rumours, and a temporary improvement has been lost again, the Funding Loan now standing at 87½ xd, the 1886 Loan at 89, the Rescission bonds at 57½, and Buenos Ayres Water and Drainage bonds at 69¾. On any further setback, however, these stocks should be an excellent purchase. Argentine Railway stocks also deserve every attention on the reaction which has now again come about, and which is due rather to political influences than to any bad traffics. Buenos Ayres Great Southern at 147, for instance, are certainly a good investment. Not only is the line doing well at present, but for the half-year ended December 31 last, an available balance of £257,472 is shown, and the directors have decided to pay an interim dividend for the half-year of 5½ per cent., against 5 per cent. last year. Central Argentine Ordinary dropped to 75½ on the dividend announcement, from which there has been a recovery to 77. When they were quoted ten points higher I repeatedly stated that that figure was not justified from the dividend point of view. The Company has now announced the payment of a balance dividend of 1 per cent. (against 1¾ per cent. last year), making a total dividend of 1¾ per cent. for the year, against 2¼ per cent. in 1896. My warnings were therefore fully justified, but now that traffics are assuming such large proportions, holders should stick to their stocks. Buenos Ayres and Rosario, after touching a higher quotation, now stand at 70, and Cordoba Central (Central Northern Section) Income Debentures are down to 46, Cordoba and Rosario Prefs. to 42½. Uruguay bonds have maintained a very firm front, notwithstanding the surrounding weakness, the Old Loan standing at 45¾, the New Loan at 56. Brazilians, on the other hand, are lower, the financial outlook in Rio de Janeiro giving rise to much anxiety. The 1889 Loan is now down to 48½, Western of Minas to 50. Chilians are firmer, the 1886 Loan at 75. Mexican Sixes have maintained quotations, and Peruvian Corporation stocks have been fairly steady.

The Kaffir Circus—An Improved Outlook.

Were it not for the political troubles in other quarters of the globe, we might have had an important advance in the South African department, as there have been indications of late of a very strong undercurrent. The fact is that politics in the Transvaal are no longer to the front, and now that the Volksraad has gone home, Oom Paul is apparently quieting down. Reports are current that he tried to obtain a loan from German bankers, but that this was refused, unless concessions were made to the mining industry. The fact will doubtless be brought home to him shortly that he will be unable to obtain any big loan either in Germany or in France, and certainly not in England, unless he grants reasonable concessions to that industry from which almost the whole revenue of the Transvaal is derived. There is the alternative of raising the money in Holland, or of obtaining advances from the Netherlands Railway Company and the Dynamite Company, but the relations of the Transvaal Government with these two undertakings are looked upon with so much suspicion, even in the Volksraad, that President Kruger will have much difficulty in piloting such arrangements through the Raad. The further recovery in leading South African shares was doubtless due to the reduction in the account shown at the settlement, and to the steady progress which is being made by the mining industry. It is true that there is some scarcity of native labour, and for that reason the March output may not prove a record. But even if it does not reach the January figures it will be considerably above the February return. Only a passing allusion is due to the rumour which was spread on Wednesday by some unscrupulous persons that President Kruger was dead. No doubt a good many people would not be sorry to see him depart from his present sphere, but it is difficult to realise how such a rumour could have been put about, unless some ingenious person, seeing the rise in South African mines, jumped to the conclusion that something of the kind might have happened. Rand Mines at one time touched $29\frac{3}{4}$, and a temporary setback appears to have merely been caused by the reactions in American Rails, which appear to affect the Kaffir Circus in some extraordinary manner. Formerly the impression usually prevailed that an advance or fall in American rails and in Kaffir mines would not happen at the same time, but nous avons changé tout cela. The Kaffir jobbers at present take a lively interest in Yankee Rails, and I am told that they sold big "Bears" of these on Friday night, which they bought back at a moderate profit on Saturday morning. Such quick deals are not possible nowadays in the Kaffir Circus. A fair amount of business has been transacted in Consolidated Goldfields and East Rands, in which at one time a rise of from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{8}$ was established. Although this has not been fully maintained, there is no doubt that the outlook is much better, and both these shares will doubtless receive fresh attention in the near future. Rand Mines will probably take a fresh start, when the full mail reports of the meeting of shareholders in Johannesburg come to hand. The fact that the Board of the Rand Mines, Limited, is quite willing to agree to a measure for splitting the shares should act as a warning to ursine operators not to commit themselves too far in them, as the mere rumour that this step is about to be taken would suffice to send the price up very considerably. Randfontein at one time improved to $1\frac{5}{8}$-$\frac{3}{4}$, from which there has been a slight reaction, but they will probably move quickly when a more general advance takes place. The present level of prices is certainly very moderate, and purchases of the above-mentioned mines, as well as of the better-class Witwatersrand mines, such as New Primrose, Glencairn, Langlaagte Estate, Knights, &c., may be recommended for investment. Similarly, some of the Deep Level shares are now to be picked up at tempting quotations, more particularly Goldfields Deep which at present stand at $8\frac{9}{16}$. With reference to the special general meeting of Knight's Deep, Limited, which was recently held in Johannesburg, I am inclined to fully endorse the view expressed by the South African Financial Record, that the proceedings on that occasion should suffice to calm the apprehensions of the Economist writer lest the Consolidated Gold Fields and the Gold Fields Deep might find the task of financing their deep levels too great a strain on their resources. Major Sapte was able to inform shareholders that such progress had already been made by the London office with regard to the proposed issue of £400,000 of debentures which the meeting was called to authorise, that the matter was practically assured. The arrival of Mr Cecil Rhodes in England will no doubt eventually, either directly or indirectly, act as a support for Chartered shares, and I should not be a bit surprised if there were to be a considerable advance in these, in which case the rest of the South African market would most probably also be favourably affected. Obviously, however, everything must depend upon politics and war prospects. Diamond shares have been temporarily dull in sympathy with the weakness on the Paris Bourse, but De Beers have since rallied to $27\frac{3}{16}$, New Jagersfontein to $7\frac{3}{8}$.

Golden West Australia.

A marked recovery has taken place in the tone of the West Australian market, the last settlement having conclusively shown that the account has been considerably reduced, while forced liquidation has evidently come to an end. The output of gold continues on a large scale, and exports for March amounted to 75,380 oz., to which 8,396 oz. from the Murchison mines, which arrived after the closing of the export returns, have to be added. This compares with 53,739 oz. in February, 93,395 oz. in January this year, and with 40,296 oz. in March last year. The strongest group has been that of the London and Globe Finance Corporation, these shares having advanced to $1\frac{5}{8}$ on the circular to which I drew attention last week. Lake View Consols, too, have been a strong market at $9\frac{3}{8}$, while Ivanhoe have moved up to $5\frac{1}{8}$, a good demand being experienced for all these shares. The amalgamation of the sub-companies of the London and Globe has now been fully authorised, and there is every prospect of the new undertaking, the Standard Exploration Company, proving a success. In the West Australian Market Trust Group a temporary setback is being recovered again. Northern Territories at one time fell to 4, from which there was an improvement to $4\frac{3}{16}$. Very satisfactory statements were made at the meetings of the Western Australian Joint Stock Trust and the Western Australian Loan and General Finance Company, and the explanation as to why no larger distributions are made seems to indicate a conservative policy, to which no objection ought to be raised. It will not have escaped my readers that at the meeting of the Western Australian Joint Stock Trust the Chairman made the statement that the Founders' shares, which take pound for pound with the Trust after the receipt of a dividend of 10 per cent. by the latter, will get £13,000 in cash and £26,000 in script, which of course represents a very handsome dividend upon the capital of the Founders' Company. In reply to a shareholder, who asked for further particulars, the Chairman stated that this meant something over 5 per cent. in cash upon the nominal capital of the Founders' Company, while the script, if converted into cash, would raise the cash dividend to something like $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Under these circumstances the £1 Founders' shares appear to be a very cheap purchase at anything like $\frac{7}{8}$-1. The list of crushings this week is a large one, and it contains some important figures:—

	Tons of Ore Crushed.	Oz. of Gold.	Assay of Tailings Per Ton.
Great Boulder Proprietary	1,402	3,161	—
Belle Vue Proprietary	159	392	—
Queensland Menzies	90	312	—
Great Boulder Main Reef	830	1,100	—
Australia United	145	297	—
Burbank's Birthday Gift	470	645	—
Paddington Consols	1,200	665	6 dwt.
Wealth of Nations	337	347	—
Norseman	803	704	—
Golden Valley Mines	226	118	—
" "	300	$112\frac{1}{2}$	6 dwt.
Ivanhoe	1,126	1,681	15 dwt.
Menzies Consolidated	449	363	—
Bayley's United (Tailings)	690	738	—
White Feather Main Reef	580	615	9 dwt.
Hannan's Oroya	902	545	—

The Great Boulder Proprietary continues its regular output, and the Great Boulder Main Reef is beginning to show well. The Queensland Menzies, too, is doing very well, and as this is in the same district as the Lady Shenton, and, in fact, adjoins that property, the above crushing is, in conjunction with the late extremely favourable news from the Lady Shenton, of great importance to both mines and to the whole of the district generally. I understand that a very complete report on the Lady Shenton Mine has been received here by mail from Mr. Rayfield, the manager, and that it confirms to the fullest extent the advices which have been received by cable. Whenever this report is published it will at once silence all criticism. As regards dividend prospects, concerning which several correspondents have asked my opinion, I should not be surprised if the next distribution were 1s. 6d. per share, as against 1s. per share which was the previous rate, although I have no official statement on this point

The dividends for the year 1898 should thus reach at least 30 per cent. From the Florence Gold Mine the news is also very favourable, and the following cablegram has been received from Messrs. H. J. Saunders & Co.:—"Rayfield (manager) reports I have not the slightest doubt that reef cut 49 ft. your property is Shenton Reef. Shows fully 3 ft. between walls of. Contains fair sprinkling of gold. Is of opinion that better stone should be found above and below; at the present time looks encouraging for property. Is of opinion that when cross-cutting from main shaft other reefs will be struck." The West Australian Goldfields Group has been quiet, the shares of the parent Company being quoted $1\frac{11}{16}$, but Hampton Plains have improved to $\frac{7}{8}$, and it is understood that some very satisfactory information has come to hand from the property. The news concerning the various mines of the London and West Australian Exploration group is also encouraging. With reference to the Sons of Gwalia a British Australasian cablegram states that the rich discovery at the 200 ft. level is confirmed, the average of 7 oz. being maintained. The cablegram adds that the mine is looking better than ever. On the merits of the property Mr. G. W. Hall, who has just returned from Western Australia, and who was originally identified with the discovery of the Sons of Gwalia, made a long statement at a dinner given at the Hotel Cecil last week, which also goes far to prove its great value. Another function which was held last week took the form of a farewell banquet to Mr. Reginald C. Hare, the Secretary of the West Australian Government Agency, who is leaving for the Colony on a six months' trip. Sir Malcolm Fraser, the retiring Agent-General, presided, and made very complimentary remarks concerning Mr. Hare, which were fully endorsed by the assembled guests. Western Australia was, of course, the topic of all the speeches, and the address of Mr. Davies, the General Manager of the Western Australian Railways, was of special interest as indicating the wonderful progress which has been made with the development of the railway system of the Colony. Mr. Wittenoom, the new Agent-General, is expected here at the end of May. Hannan's Brownhill have been a firm market, the price recovering to $7\frac{5}{8}$, and these are the shares which will be found in the van of the improvement in Westralian mines, that cannot fail to come about sooner or later. Golden Horseshoes, after rising, are slightly easier again at $7\frac{7}{16}$, and Great Boulder Proprietary have been dealt in to some extent at 20s. 3d. According to latest cablegrams from Western Australia, the obnoxious regulation, restricting alluvial mining to a depth of 10 ft., has been cancelled, but at the same time the West Australian Cabinet declares that alluvial mining must not interfere with bona-fide working leases or with shaft mining, also that any dispute must be settled by the wardens. The Cabinet further declines to interfere on behalf of the rioters imprisoned at Kalgoorlie. As this should fully safeguard the leases, no objection is taken to the decision. The Sam's Wealth is again in the throes of reconstruction. It was originally the Sam's Wealth Gold and Exploration Company, and from the outset I pointed out that its prospects were most doubtful, and warned my readers to leave the shares severely alone. About eighteen months ago the company came to the end of its tether, and was reconstructed under the name of the Sam's Wealth Mines Development Company. Now again money is required for carrying on its operations, and a second reconstruction is to be resorted to. As prospects are exceedingly doubtful, and seem to depend chiefly on the striking of some rich ore in the neighbouring property, it would appear to be most desirable to wind up the concern, and not to throw good money after bad.

Indian, Australasian, and British Columbian Mines.

In the Indian section business has been restricted, but an improvement to $5\frac{1}{16}$ in Champion reefs is marked on the announcement of the dividend. Nundydroog, which are quoted, ex the dividend of 3s., at $3\frac{5}{8}$, are also firmer; but Goldfields of Mysore, Coromandel, Balaghat, and Mysore Wynaad are all lower. In Australian mines, other than West Australian, British Broken Hill are easier, and there have also been declines in Mount Morgan, Mount Lyell South, New Australian Broken Hill, and Day Dawn Block. On the other hand, Mount Lyells are firmer. From the very interesting report of the West Australian Chamber of Mines (London), I extract the following figures of the gold production of the Australasian Colonies for 1897 and 1896:—

	Ounces.		Value (£).

* Approximate.

This comparison shows what wonderful strides Western Australia is making as compared with the sister colonies. In New Zealand mines dealings have been on a small scale. Hauraki and Komata Reefs are lower, and Taitapu have eased off; but Waihi and Waitekauri have improved. Some dealings are reported in Hauraki Associated, which are 4s. shares fully-paid, and quoted 1s. 6d. Crushing is in progress on this mine, and the shares at their very low price deserve attention. Since November last the crushings have been as follows:—

December 22,	100 tons	274 ozs.
January 28,	90 ,,	290 ,,
March 18,	150 ,,	518 ,,

Amongst British Columbian mines a firmer tone has been noticeable, and it looks as if we were going to have more active dealings. A decline has, however, taken place in British Columbia Development Association, Lilooet, Fraser River and Cariboo Goldfields, Vancouver and British Columbia General Exploration, and in War Eagle Consolidated, Hall Mines also being easier. Klondike Bonanza, on the other hand, have improved slightly. British America Corporation shares have been firmer, and a considerable business has been transacted, the quotation being now 20s.6d. to 21s. Governor Mackintosh has left hurriedly for British Columbia. It is an open secret that he is entrusted with a confidential mission concerning a very important business transaction for the London and Globe and British America Corporations. While a large proportion of the Companies in this section which were so plentifully started some three or six months ago, are likely not to be heard of again, others which have enjoyed good management are coming to the front. This is the case with the London and British Columbian Goldfields, a Company which has paid already a dividend of 1s. per share, the capital amounting to £75,000, in £1 shares, 15s. paid, which are quoted $\frac{1}{16}$ - $\frac{3}{16}$ premium. This Company owns the whole of the Ymir Mines, and various other properties, including a 50 per cent. interest in the Whitewater Mines, Limited, and a third interest in the Ruth Silver Mines, while it has also promising claims in the Yukon. The Whitewater Mines, the shares in which are quoted at $\frac{1}{16}$ $\frac{3}{16}$ premium, is already producing silver, and the net proceeds of ore shipped during the first three months of the current year are estimated at $22,300. Some 3,000 tons of ore are reported to be in sight, and it is expected that the output will now be largely increased. Another Company which has thrown itself very energetically into the Klondike business is the Klondike and Columbia Goldfields, Limited. According to the statements made by Mr. J. Morris Catton, the Chairman, who has just returned from the Dominion, this Company has acquired claims on Bonanza Creek, Sulphur Creek, and Dixon Creek, also five miles of dredging rivers on the Klondike itself, and five miles on other rich rivers in the same district, besides various properties in British Columbia. In connection with this Company, the Klondike and Columbian Passenger Agency has been formed, wharves and steamers have been acquired, and as some 200,000 people are expected to travel to Klondike this year, a large transportation business is looked for. This Agency undertakes to convey passengers from London to Klondike for £300, including one year's provisions, viâ Victoria, Dyea (luggage being transported by aerial tramway across the Chilcoot Pass) to Lake Linderman, thence by boat to Klondike, and, to judge from the crowds attracted by the complete miner's outfit which is shown at the Agency's offices at Ludgate Hill, great interest is taken in the facilities offered. Mexican Mines have been steady, and an early revival in Consolidated Goldfields of Mexico is looked for, while Grand Central have improved to 1⅝-¾.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new enterprises and issues have been placed before the public during the week:—

The Linotype Company, Limited.—This is an issue of £250,000 (part of an authorised issue of £1,000,000) 4 per cent. First Mortgage Debentures of £5 each. This extra capital is raised for the purpose of providing funds for completing a capital outlay of upwards of £400,000 in the acquisition of land and building thereon the Company's new works at Broadheath, near Manchester, and other purposes. The share capital of the Company is £2,000,000, divided into Preference and Ordinary shares of £5 each.

The Rubber Estates of Pará, Limited.—This Company is formed to purchase and work the Pará Rubber Estates of the Visconde de St. Domingos, situate in the centre of the rubber districts known as the Islands in the district of Anajas, State of Pará, Brazil, and to carry on the business of rubber curers, shippers, &c. The capital is fixed at £350,000, divided into Preference and Ordinary shares of £1 each.

Bengal Dooars Railway Company, Limited.—The Nationa Bank of India, Limited, are authorised to receive subscriptions for the issue of 25,000 shares of £10 each = £250,000, being the remaining portion of an authorised capital of £400,000 at the issue price of £10 10s. per £10 share. The Company is empowered by contract with the Secretary of State in Council of India to pay interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum on the shares until the lines to be constructed are open for traffic, or until June 30, 1901, whichever may be the earlier date.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

Arlo.—I think that the exchange from Brazilians into Mining shares would be advantageous to you, if you are content to hold the latter for some time. Hardup.—If you send me a stamped and addressed envelope, I will forward you the name of such a firm. The matter is safe enough as long as you do not pay more than market price. C. A., Warwickshire.—I do not advise a purchase of this scrip. Nemo, Highgate.—I do not think that the tales about default on the part of the Brazilian Government are quite reliable, and it would be advisable to now hold Nos. 1 and 2. As regards No. 3, that is entirely a question of future arrangement, but as an English Company is about to take over the line there is every prospect of the situation improving. 4. No; stand where you are.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

Charlie.—You must really tell me what class of investments you require. If you want to be quite safe you cannot get more than 3 per cent.; if you do not mind a little risk, you can get 5 per cent.; and in more speculative undertakings you can get up to 8 per cent., of course, without any guarantee of security. Subaltern.—I know nothing about the Corporation mentioned. I will send you the address you ask for on receipt of a stamped and addressed envelope. H. J. M.—This is a third-rate Insurance Company, and personally, when the question of security is considered, I think it best to insure with a first-rate institution, even though the terms should be higher. I should prefer the Sun Life, the Scottish Widows' Fund, the Provident Life Office, and other institutions of the same class. Emma.—I see nothing objectionable in the Government Annuities, and under the circumstances stated by you, I think that the very best plan is to make the investment proposed. You might, however, before coming to terms, obtain the conditions upon which the Scottish Widows' Fund or the Sun Life Office would carry out the same arrangements. The amount of uncalled capital on joint-stock banks is, of course, a drawback, although if you select a high-class undertaking, the risk is almost nominal. Dunips.—I would strongly advise you to defend the case, as these outside brokers are not likely to go into court. If you send me a stamped and addressed envelope, I will forward the name of a smart firm of City solicitors.

Home Rails.

Marcus.—1. No; I advise you to deal only through members of the Stock Exchange. 2. Ditto. 3. Great Central Deferred are fair value at present price, but the 1894 Ordinary are a far better purchase. 4. Quite so. Demos.—I am afraid you cannot alter matters as regards the relations in which you are now with the firm in question, but I may be able to help you if you send me a stamped and addressed envelope.

American and Foreign Rails.

E. P.—There is nothing against Mexican Central Four per Cent. Gold bonds, if you are a holder of these. Bex.—1. This is a speculative stock, and is sure to move generally with the Yankee market. 2. Yes, 5 per cent. was paid for the year ended June, 1897. 3. A fair speculation, but as the stock is not quoted here, it is far better to invest in one that is. 4. Not in the open market, only by making special arrangements. Blairnile.—It is quite impossible to give any further figures with reference to the Union Pacific, and I do not wish to influence your own judgment in any way. L. P. C.—I think that the American Railroad bonds A to D would suit you, although they would not exactly be my selection. I have repeatedly given lists of such bonds in which it is advisable to invest, and to these I adhere. Grand Trunk prospects appear to be very favourable, but I do not wish to pin myself to the statement which you want. The time to average the other bonds has not yet arrived. It will be better to wait until a definite proposal for a reconstruction of the road has been brought forward.

Mining Shares.

Jona.—I do not advise a purchase of the shares mentioned by you. You can do better in other shares which are likely to be more in the front rank when the advance comes. L. D. S.—Certainly hold Oceana for an improvement. Egerton.—A fair mining risk, but no catch. J. R.—I have always expressed an unfavourable view of Klerksdorps, and still hold the same opinion. The other shares may recover, but at present there is no temptation to buy more of either of them. Broach, Lamp, L. G., Z.—You should not trouble yourselves about every letter which may be written to the newspapers with regard to mines. The position of the Lady Shenton is so assured that the opinion of some stray correspondent is absolutely unimportant. I understand that the directors have in their possession a detailed mail report, which in every respect fully confirms the high value of the mine. If you only hold tight to your shares, you will see them at double their present price in a comparatively short time. You should disregard these "Bear" tactics, as there are a good many people who would like to get in cheap. Also see remarks under "Golden West Australia." Upton.—1. I have never had a favourable opinion of East Lake Views, and must decline to advise on the subject of shares which are bought against my advice. 2. No option but to hold for the present. 3. Leave these alone. 4. A fair mining risk, but no catch. 5. These may improve in sympathy with the group. 6. The news from the Hampton Plains is still very favourable, and I understand that some fresh satisfactory advices have lately been received. The address of the secretary is 28 and 29, St. Swithin's-lane, E.C. J. E. B.—1. As an exceptional matter I forward you what you require in your envelope. 2. It would not be a bad plan to divide the money as you suggest over Randfontein, Florence, and London and Globe shares. 3. There is no liability for calls on Randfontein or London and Globe. Emma, Scarborough.—1. I cannot tell you when this Company is going to pay another dividend, but it is supposed to be doing well. 2. No fresh news; but that which has already come to hand is favourable. Lipton.—1. Yes, you might buy more Randfontein to average. 2. I have never said a word in favour of Blagroves, and do not like them now. 3. Take a profit while you can get it. S. E G.—1. The shares are nominally quoted 4½d. to 7½d., and the office is at 2 and 3, Birchin-lane, E.C. 2. The news is fairly satisfactory, but the shares are, of course, speculative. Alpha, Belfast.—The South African Market is likely to improve generally, and your only course is to hold for a recovery. J. McI.—1. Lady Shenton, Ivanhoe, London and Globe, and West Australia Joint Stock Trust Founders. 2. Quite high enough. Burdon.—1. I am informed that the news from the Hampton Plains is very satisfactory, and under all the circumstances I advise you to hold. B. C. A.—Yes, Lady Shenton are a good purchase, and another dividend is in sight. It should be of 1s. 6d. per share, against the last of 1s. C. W. H.—This is not a Company of which I expressed a favourable opinion, and I advise you to get out if you can.

Industrial Shares.

Perplexed Investor.—No particular reason to sell Apollinaris shares after the fall. You might as well take your profit on English Sewing Cotton shares. R. W.—Financial News Prefs. are a good newspaper investment, and I do not see any reason for selling the shares again. Singer.—If you really want the money I suppose that your best plan is to sell rather than to incur fresh liability. C. B.—All Industrial investments are more or less speculative, but the shares mentioned by you might safely be held. Stoke.—The shares Nos. 1 to 3 are fairly promising. The Savoy Hotel (4) has, as you must be aware, passed through a very disagreeable experience, and it is not for me to say what will be the upshot. Nos. 5 and 6 are also speculative. W. J. H.—Why do you take the advice of such journals, which have absolutely no financial standing. I certainly do not like the concern. Lion.—No reason to sell Nos. 1 and 2.

Mixed Investments.

A. H. B.—There is absolutely no reason why you should sell Buenos Ayres Water and Drainage bonds, and as regards the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad the re-organisation is in progress, and you should hold. High Hill.—I. Certainly; if De Beers reach your cost price again, which is about three points above the present value, you should sell them. There is, however, nothing to be anxious about. II. No option but to hold for the present. III. This motor concern is practically valueless. IV. This is also a very doubtful concern. Why did you not heed my warnings against this kind of investment. C. M.—The reason is that gilt-edged investments generally have declined, owing to the fears of dearer money. I cannot advise you with reference to the diamond shares mentioned.

A Chapter on Industrial Stocks.

The war scares have again exercised an unfavourable effect upon the Industrial department, and business has been interfered with as in other sections by the threatened rupture between the United States and Spain. The settlement, however, passed off satisfactorily, and rates were no heavier than last time. In fact, there was a tendency for contangos to ease off. The feature has been the Lipton allotment, which has certainly been completed with commendable promptitude, although it disappointed a good many people who received only very small numbers of shares. Perhaps they had no right to grumble much, as it had already been fully stated that friends and business connections would have the preference. According to the Financial News the following are, however, some of the specimen allotments. An applicant for 20,000 shares received 50 only, while one for 20,000 obtained the whole allotment. Another man who applied for 5,000 shares was allotted 200, one applicant for 200 received 10 and another 100, while a lady who had applied for twenty-five, got the whole number. I suppose that some allowance has to be made for the elimination of "stags," but, upon the whole, somehow the allotment had a flavour of "kissing goes by favour." The other allotment of the week—that of Vi-Cocoa—has also been made very promptly; but I have no figures to go upon in this case. It is stated, however, that many applications have been declined, the Ledger clients receiving the preference. The Anglo dividend proved a pleasant surprise to the market, and shows that even war rumours have their compensation, as they evidently increased the business of the Anglo-American Telegraph Company. I suppose that if war breaks out there will be even more cablegrams to be sent, and thus the present price of Anglo "A" of 13¼ may be justified. In West Australian Timber shares a steady business is being transacted, Millars' Karri and Jarrah being quoted 3⅜, Davies 1⅝, Canning ¼ premium, Jarrah Timber and Wood Paving ¼ premium. Allsopp Ordinary have not been in favour, and have remained in the neighbourhood of 152. As was shown by the remarks made at the shareholders' meeting the financial proposals are distinctly unpopular with the shareholders as well as with the market. Instead of gambling in Allsopps it is, doubtless, far more promising to look for some of the Home Brewery Preference stocks which are still obtainable at moderate price. Such are, for instance, the £5 Cumulative Five and a Half per Cent. Preference shares of J. & J. Yardley & Co., the breweries of which are situate at Bloxwich, Darlaston, and Wolverhampton. These can at present be bought at 4¾. The Company is earning a considerable dividend on the Ordinary shares, and the sales show an increase over those of the previous year. It holds a number of valuable tied houses, and some favourable announcement is shortly expected. In May next a six months' dividend on the Preference shares is due. Russian Petroleum Ordinary are slightly firmer at 20¾, the Prefs. at 10⅞, while Schibaieff are being dealt in at ¼ premium. English Sewing Cottons have been dull at $\frac{9}{16}$ premium, and the promptness of the Lipton allotment brings strongly in relief the vexatious delays that were connected with the Cotton allotment. Welsbach Incandescent Gas stocks, after declining, have firmed up again, the Ordinary to 113, the Preferred to 100, the Deferred to 20s. 6d. In Bovril shares a slight recovery has taken place to 12s. 3d. for the Deferred, while the Ordinary stand at ⅞-1. Schweppes have displayed weakness, the Deferred at $\frac{9}{16}$, the Ordinary at $1\frac{3}{16}$. Hudson's Bay shares have been somewhat firmer at 21¼. Cycle shares have given indications of a moderate revival, and it would not be surprising to see more business, considering the approach of the cycling season. It is true that Dunlop Deferred have again shown great weakness, being down to 10s. 9d., while the Ordinary are also lower at 15s. 6d. Humber Ordinary, however, are the turn firmer at 13s. the Extensions at 7s. Swifts have hardened to 11s., while Singers have receded to 10s. 6d. Cycle Components are better at 29s. 6d., and Amalgamated Tyres are quoted 6s. 9d. A few of the shares of the manufacturing Companies show advances, notably Raglan at 12s. 6d., New Premier at 12s. 6d., and Griffiths at 4s. Spratt's Patent shares are being steadily dealt in at 12¾-13¼. According to the statements made at the meeting, the appointment of Mr. Stephen Wingrove as a Director has been favourabl received, and so has been, of course, the dividend of 12½ per cent. for the year. National Explosives shares are being dealt in to some extent at 1¼-⅜. This reminds me of the fact that the early history of this undertaking was a chequered one. It was formed as far back as 1888 with a capital of £100,000, but having to contend with the dynamite ring it had to be reconstructed in 1892. It is all the more satisfactory, from the shareholders' point of view, that it should now have achieved success, as for the year 1897 a profit of £26,204 was made, and the Company was able to pay 9 per cent. on the Preference and 11 per cent. on the Ordinary shares. The Chairman seems to be sanguine that the prosperity of the Company will continue, even without the cancellation of the dynamite monopoly in the Transvaal, which would, of course, be of the greatest possible importance to the Company. Unfortunately, there is very little hope of such a desirable consummation, as long as Oom Paul remains in his present mood. A share earning 11 per cent. cannot, however, be said to be dear at the price of $1\frac{5}{16}$. Amongst the new industrial undertakings which have recently been placed before the public one of the most extraordinary flotations was that of Holbrook's Worcestershire Sauce, Limited (United States of America and Canadian rights). How the Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Company can ask £60,000 for the right to vend this sauce in the United States and Canada I am at a loss to understand. It implies a taste on the part of our Yankee cousins for Worcester sauce with which they are not credited by other people. It must be considered, of course, that the new Company will only attend to the sale of the sauce, and that the manufacture—which is, no doubt, the most profitable part of the business—will, as hitherto, be in the hands of the vendor company. A prospectus is being privately circulated by the Consolidated Exploration and Finance Company, Limited, which offers 2,000 shares of £5 each in George Whybrow, Limited (proprietors of Whybrow's Pickles). The Company was formed in the autumn of last year, so that I suppose the public have not subscribed for the shares to the extent asked for, although a great fuss is made as regards this being "a home industrial business established in the reign of King George the Third." A correspondent forwards me the prospectus of the Anglo-Canadian Petroleum Company, Limited, which has been sent to him by Mr. Joseph G. Hillam, of 30, Moorgate-street, London, E.C., who, he says, is a complete stranger to him. In the accompanying circular Mr. Hillam offers an underwriting commission of 7½ per cent. in cash and 10 per cent. in fully-paid Cumulative Preference shares for the first 14,000 shares applied for in advance. These are pretty good terms, but I question whether they will tempt many capitalists, as the future of the concern appears to be very much in the air, and the promotion of petroleum Companies has been greatly overdone of late.—Your affectionate uncle,

MOSES.

Old False Teeth Bought.—Many ladies and gentlemen have by them old or disused false teeth, which might as well be turned into money. Messrs. R. D. & J. B. Fraser, of Princes-street, Ipswich (established since 1833), buy old false teeth. If you send your teeth to them they will remit you by return post the utmost value; or, if preferred, they will make you the best offer, and hold the teeth over for your reply. If reference necessary, apply to Messrs. Bacon & Co., Bankers, Ipswich.

Glacier Window Decoration.—A pleasant occupation for ladies is the decoration of the windows of the house, and a reliable substitute for Stained Glass, giving warmth and brightness at small cost, should be warmly welcomed. Glacier has now for 15 years stood the test of use in every country in the world. Send rough plan and measurements of any window, and sketch and estimate of cost of decoration with Glacier will be sent free of charge.—M'Caw, Stevenson, & Orr, Ltd., 29, Cannon-st., London, E.C., & Belfast.

QUEER STORY.

LADY DOLLY'S REVENGE.

"GREAT floods have flowed from simple sources." Tragedies have sprung from trifles light as air. If Teddy Brooke of the —th Hussars had not chanced to come up from York by the train that gets to King's Cross at 2 10 he would never have seen what he did see. Not that his seeing what he did see would have mattered so much, if he had not straightway told it all to Lady Dolly D'Arcy. But then he did tell it all to Lady Dolly D'Arcy, and that was the root of the whole matter. For Lady Dolly was a woman, and everybody knows what women are.

"I've got such a joke to tell you," said Teddy, as he lounged lazily in Lady Dolly's boudoir and smoked one of Lady Dolly's own special cigarettes—"such a screaming joke. Jove! how I laughed about it afterwards, and so will you."

Lady Dolly nodded her golden head.

"Go on," she said encouragingly: "it's long enough since I heard a really good joke. They're rather scarce nowadays. Who is it about, Teddy?"

Teddy looked at her and winked solemnly.

"Ah!" he remarked, "that's just where the point comes in. It's about—you would never guess who—your old pal Geoffrey Hamilton."

Lady Dolly shrugged her pretty shoulders, and threw the end of her cigarette into the fire.

"Why my old pal?" she asked scornfully. "He never was a special pal of mine that I know of."

Teddy maintained a discreet silence. In common with the rest of the world he knew that Geoffrey Hamilton had at one time been a very special friend and admirer of Lady Dolly's, also that she had taken his marriage rather badly—but of course he could not say so. A man cannot very well say things of that sort to a woman, even if he wishes to—and Teddy did not wish to.

"A joke about Geoffrey Hamilton ought to be a good one," Lady Dolly went on, as she lighted a fresh cigarette with great deliberation. "At all events, it will be a novelty. He is not the sort of man who lends himself easily to jokes."

"Rather not!" said Teddy. "Now listen, Dolly, and I'll tell you all about it."

Lady Dolly composed herself comfortably in her chair, with her feet crossed on the brass rail of the fender, and her hands clasped at the back of her head.

"Go on," she said again.

Teddy went on.

"You see," he said, "it was like this. When I got to King's Cross I suddenly remembered that I'd forgotten to send a wire that I ought to have sent before I left York, so I turned into the telegraph office to send it. Well, when I got into the office there seemed to be a deuce of a row going on, and I couldn't make out what it was. There was a girl crying, and arguing, and making no end of a fuss, and a clerk arguing, too—you never saw such a set-out. Well, I looked and listened a bit, and first I thought I'd clear out and leave them to it, but the girl—she was a jolly pretty girl, and a lady, too—seemed in such trouble that I thought after all I'd better take a hand in the game. I'm hanged if I can stand seeing a woman cry. It always knocks me out of time."

Teddy paused for breath, and Lady Dolly looked at him from beneath her half-closed eyelids.

"Where does Mr. Hamilton come in?" she asked.

"Give me time," returned Teddy. "What are you in such a hurry for? Well, as I said before, I thought I'd better take a hand in the game. So I went up to the girl and brought out my best manners. 'I beg your pardon,' says I, 'but you seem to be in trouble about something, and I don't like to see a lady in trouble. Can I help you in any way?' The girl turned to me all in a hurry. 'Oh! thank you,' she said; and then she told me the whole story. It seems that she was going to Scarborough, and when she went to take her ticket she found that her pocket had been picked and her purse was gone, so she'd missed her train. Well, that was bad enough, but what she seemed to think worse still was that she couldn't send a wire to the people she was going to. There she was, crying, and offering her umbrella to the clerk, and begging him to take it and send the wire for it. 'I'll bring you the money in an hour,' she said, 'I swear I will. It will only take me that time to go home and get it. I wouldn't ask you to do such a thing, but that every moment is of importance to me. Oh! do send the wire—do.' But the clerk happened to be one of those pompous, wooden-headed, leather-hearted fools who can't see an inch in front of their own noses. 'It's a very extraordinary request,' says he, 'a very extraordinary request indeed, and I should be greatly exceeding my duty if I acceded to it. Your tale may be true, or it may not. In my opinion——' Well, here I came to the rescue. I'd heard enough. 'Oh! stow that,' says I, 'we don't want to hear your opinion; we can get on very well without it. Just send the lady's message, will you, and stop making a fool of yourself?' I really thought he was going to have a fit, but, however, he thought better of it, and took the money I gave him and held out his hand for the telegram like a lamb. The girl had already written it, and now handed it over. I have my share of curiosity, though I'm not a woman, and I must say I should like to have seen what was written on that form. She was too quick for me though, and I only just caught sight of the address. What do you think it was?"

Lady Dolly contemplated the tips of her pretty toes as they rested on the fender in front of her.

"How should I know?" she asked, with a fine assumption of indifference that did not deceive Teddy Brooke in the very least.

He laughed.

"Geoffrey Hamilton, Grand Hotel, Scarborough," he said. "There! what do you think of that?"

Lady Dolly frowned thoughtfully, still contemplating her toes.

"It might be another Geoffrey Hamilton," she suggested.

"It might," said Teddy, "it might, but I happen to know that our mutual friend is at Scarborough now, and staying at the Grand. He went a day or two ago to see his brother-in-law, who has been taken ill there."

"And his wife?" asked Lady Dolly. "Is she with him?"

"No," answered Teddy, "she's in town. I met her as I was driving here this afternoon."

"Ah!" said Lady Dolly, and then she relapsed into silence.

Teddy watched her rather uneasily. Whither her thoughts tended he did not know, but it was evident from the expression of her face that they went far. When at last he spoke to her she started as if she had quite forgotten that he was there.

"Well, what do you make of it?" he asked.

She laughed, shrugging her shoulders.

"What do I make of it?" she repeated. "What should I make of it if it had happened to be my husband, or you, or any man of my acquaintance?"

Teddy laughed too.

"She was a jolly pretty girl," he said rather vaguely, "and in such trouble."

Lady Dolly looked at him sharply.

"What has that got to do with it?" she asked. "I suppose Mr Hamilton has been trying his hand at—at flirtation again. He used to be rather good at it, and although he is married now—well—why should he be different from other men?"

"Why, indeed?" Teddy replied drily. "His wife thinks he is, though."

"Oh! his wife," said Lady Dolly, with fine disdain. "His wife! She is such a strange girl, half a child and half a saint. Who is to understand her?"

"She has uncommon fine eyes," said Teddy reflectively, "and she believes in her husband with all her heart. I hope she'll never get wind of anything of this kind, for there will be the devil to pay if she does. Mind you don't let the cat out of the bag, Dolly. I'll never tell you a joke again if you do."

Lady Dolly nodded and changed the subject. She had made up her mind what she would do; but she was not going to enlighten Teddy. She knew her world.

"I'll let the little fool know that Geoffrey isn't all she thinks him,' she thought to herself, while Teddy poured the latest garrison gossip into her inattentive ears. "I can do it by degrees; just a hint here and a word there, and then, as Teddy says, there will be the devil to pay. Not that she will make scenes—she isn't that sort of woman. It will be a case of the little rift within the lute, that's all. She is too proud to ask him for an explanation: she will only be cold and different to him; and he—don't I know him?—he will never ask her why she is different. He would sooner die. They will drift gradually apart, and then——"

Fate had placed an opportunity for revenge in Lady Dolly's way, and she was not the woman to let it pass.

* * * * *

Lady Dolly and the Hamiltons met very often, as people in the same set always must, and they met the next evening at an At Home. Lady Dolly was by way of being rather friendly with Geoffrey Hamilton's wife, and it never occurred to the latter that the charming smile with which she invariably greeted her veiled the strongest emotions of hatred and jealousy that had ever stirred the shallows of her ladyship's frivolous nature. Ursula Hamilton took everything and everybody quite seriously. She was, as Lady Dolly said, a strange girl, half child and half saint, and her ways were not altogether the ways of Lady Dolly's world.

"How hot it is!" said Lady Dolly, pausing in her passage through the crowded room, a dainty Dresden china-like figure in a shimmer of satin and diamonds. "I wish Mrs. Talbot-Browne wouldn't ask so many people. It's positive cruelty. Mr. Hamilton, do you feel inclined to play the part of Good Samaritan to the extent of getting me an ice?"

"Of course I do," answered Geoffrey Hamilton, as in duty bound; "and if you will trust yourself to me I think I can find you a quiet place to eat it in."

"It sounds too good to be true," laughed Lady Dolly. "May I put him to the test, Mrs. Hamilton? Can you spare him for five minutes?"

There was a challenge in her eyes, but Ursula Hamilton did not see it.

"Oh! yes," she answered, indifferently.

Lady Dolly looked curiously at her as she stood there in her tall, cold, serene beauty, and laughed again as she moved away by Geoffrey Hamilton's side. He piloted her skilfully through the fashionable crowd to a deep, cushioned window seat that by good luck happened to be vacant just then.

"Is this better?" he asked. "If you don't mind waiting a moment, I'll do my best for you in the way of an ice, but don't expect great things."

Lady Dolly sank down on the soft cushions with a sigh of relief.

"Oh! this is too nice," she said. "Get an apricot ice, if you can, and please be quick. The heat has made me feel quite faint."

"I'm sorry," said Geoffrey, and he hurried away.

In a few minutes he returned triumphant.

"Here you are," he said; "I got the best I could. I hope you feel better now."

"Yes, thank you," said Lady Dolly decorously.

He sat down beside her and took up the large white feather fan that lay on her knee.

"Shall I fan you?' he asked.

"Yes—no—I don't care," Lady Dolly answered, rather incoherently. "Look here, Geoffrey, I want to say a word to you quietly, before we're disturbed."

A slight expression of surprise crossed his face.

"I am at your service," he said, with grave and distant politeness. "What can I do for you, Lady Dolly?"

She laughed a little and shrugged her shoulders at the formal address, but she made no remark.

"Oh! it's nothing very special," she said; "I heard a little story about you yesterday, that's all. Teddy Brooke told it to me, and you may thank your stars that he chose me for his confidante. You know what some women are. They delight in spreading a tale all over London, but—but I am not like that, and Teddy can be awfully discreet when he chooses. Besides——" She paused, and her eyes filled up the silence eloquently.

Geoffrey frowned, and his face grew white and stern.

"If you have anything to say, say it," he returned curtly. "What has Brooke been telling you about me?"

"You needn't be so—so—er—brusque," Lady Dolly retorted, with a pout. "You—you never used to speak to me like that."

He frowned again, and squared his broad shoulders with an impatient movement.

"Never mind what I used to do," he said, more gently. "Let sleeping dogs lie. It's better than waking them up, I assure you. What did Brooke tell you?"

She smiled at him mischievously over her last spoonful of ice.

"Such a funny little tale," she answered. "Put my plate down, and I'll tell you all about it."

So Geoffrey put her plate down, and then she told him all about it; and he listened in silence, with a very grave look in his dark eyes—a look that she had never seen there before. When she had finished he did not fly into a rage, as she had half expected he would; he did not even make a remark, but sat staring into space with as absent and preoccupied an air as if he had forgotten her existence. Lady Dolly felt puzzled and angry.

"Well?" she said at last. "Haven't you a word to say for yourself? What does it all mean?"

He roused himself then and turned to her gravely, so gravely that she was quite startled.

"It means," he said, "a great deal—a great deal more than it appears to."

Lady Dolly smiled vaguely at her fan.

"Ah, yes," she said; "things often do."

"It means," he said again, "a great deal." He paused for a moment, then leaned forward with a quick, sudden movement, and looked keenly and searchingly into her face. "We used to be good friends once," he said.

She raised her eyebrows quizzically.

"Men are so inconsistent," she remarked. "A few minutes ago, when I reminded you of that fact, you told me to let sleeping dogs lie."

He made an impatient movement.

"Be serious," he said—"please be serious. This is no laughing matter. It's—it's a matter almost of life and death."

Lady Dolly looked up quickly. The situation was becoming interesting.

"I am quite serious," she said, "and if I can help you, I will. You may depend on me."

Which was true—up to a certain point.

"It isn't a matter that concerns me," Geoffrey went on. "If it were, you and Brooke would be welcome to tell it to all the world, and to put what construction you pleased on it. I shouldn't care. But it concerns my wife."

"Ah!" said Lady Dolly softly.

"It concerns my wife," Geoffrey said again, "and for her sake I hope you will keep quiet, and make Brooke keep quiet, too. She—she has never done you any harm."

Lady Dolly smiled her sweetest and most innocent smile.

"Nobody ever does me any harm," she remarked, equably; "I never let them."

Geoffrey would have smiled, too, if he had not been in such deadly, desperate earnest. The speech was so characteristic of the woman who made it.

"I believe you," he said; and then he went on in a very grave tone, "You will keep quiet, won't you?"

Lady Dolly looked at him reflectively over the edge of her fan.

"You haven't told me the story yet," she said. "What did it all mean?"

He frowned uneasily.

"I can't tell you," he answered. "It's a dead secret. Even Ursula doesn't know it, although it concerns her own brother—and I hope to Heaven she never may."

Major Howe & Co., Ltd.—Fashionable Boots and Shoes.—16, Coventry-st., W.; 60, Strand, W.C.; 81, Gracechurch-st; and 13, Queen Victoria-st., London: "Note Addresses." (Repairs.)

Lady Dolly was silent.

"I can't tell you," Geoffrey said again. "I daren't tell you, and that's the honest truth. But I give you my word of honour, it's no scrape of my own. If it were, as I said before, you would be welcome to tell the tale to all the world. But—but—well, it's like this. My wife has only one brother, and he is a great deal more to her than most brothers are to their sisters. She positively idolises him, and thinks there is nobody like him. Well, he has got into a mess, and it is a devil of a mess; not an ordinary affair by any means, I can assure you. How he could do what he did I can't think—he must be mad as well as bad. Fortunately he came to me to help him, and I did my best for him, though I'm not accustomed to being mixed up in things of that sort. Everything is squared up and settled now, and if it hadn't been for that unlucky meeting with Brooke yesterday, no one would ever have got wind of it."

"The lady lost her head, you see," Lady Dolly remarked, examining her fan with critical attention. "If she had kept cool Teddy would have been no wiser."

"Kept cool!" Geoffrey echoed, with a short laugh. "Good heavens! You don't know all that depended on my getting that wire at a certain time, or you wouldn't talk about keeping cool."

"I know nothing," said Lady Dolly.

"You know all that you ever will know from me," Geoffrey returned curtly. "You know more than my wife knows. Poor child! If she knew all that I know it would break her heart."

"Did you ever meet any one with a broken heart?" asked Lady Dolly, still studying her fan.

He frowned impatiently.

"That is an abstract question," he said, "and we've no time to discuss abstract questions now. We might be interrupted any moment. Look here, Dolly, what do you mean to do?"

"What do you want me to do?" asked Lady Dolly slowly.

"You know as well as I do," retorted Geoffrey. "I want you to keep quiet yourself, and keep Brooke quiet too. If that tale gets about, it's bound to come to my wife's ears in the end, and then it will be a choice of two evils with a vengeance. Confound the fellow! Why did he come up by that train?"

Lady Dolly laughed softly.

"The workings of Providence are mysterious," she said.

"Oh! I think we'll leave Providence out of the question," said Geoffrey bluntly. "Providence has no business to take a hand in this sort of game. Look here, Dolly, don't keep me in suspense any longer. Promise that you'll keep quiet, and I'll do anything in the world for you—upon my soul I will. You won't round on me now, will you? Promise—for my wife's sake."

Lady Dolly raised her eyes slowly and looked at him. Geoffrey read the look, and changed his tone a little.

"Oh! well," he said, with a half laugh, "for my sake, then, if you like. We used to be good friends, and—and—for my sake, then, Dolly."

* * * * *

It was full ten minutes later before Lady Dolly, looking flushed and excited, and prettier than ever, paused by Ursula Hamilton's side.

"I have brought your husband back, Mrs. Hamilton, with many thanks for the loan," she said. "He really was as good as his word for once. He got me a delightful ice, and found me a quite charming place to eat it in." She looked at the girl whom she addressed with her sweetest and friendliest smile; then, seeing that Geoffrey had turned away to speak to a passing acquaintance, she drew a little nearer. "By-the-bye," she whispered behind her fan, safe in the solitude of a crowd, "you remember what I said to you this morning in the Park—or perhaps you have forgotten."

Ursula Hamilton flushed scarlet through all her clear sensitive skin, then grew suddenly white, and a passionate light flashed into her great grey eyes.

"Forgotten!" she echoed, and her tone would have gone straight to Lady Dolly's heart if her ladyship had happened to be in possession of such an old-fashioned commodity.

Lady Dolly smiled again.

"Ah! you always take things so seriously," she said again, "It's an awfully bad habit, and ruin to one's complexion—utter ruin." She paused for a moment with her head a little on one side, and thoughtfully contemplated the girl who had married the only man whose admiration she really cared two straws about. "You mustn't take what I told you this morning seriously though," she went on, still smiling, "for it was a joke—only a joke, I assure you. I didn't mean a word of it."

Ursula Hamilton looked at her.

"You—didn't—mean—a—word—of—it," she repeated slowly.

"Not a word," declared Lady Dolly gaily, with an emphatic shake of her golden head. "Not one single word. Did you really think I did? Why, how white you look! For Heaven's sake, don't make a scene! It was a joke, I tell you, only a joke. Forget it as quickly as you can. This is the first of April, and I made you an April fool. That is all."

Ursula turned suddenly scarlet again.

"Lady Dolly," she exclaimed, "I—I——"

But Lady Dolly had had enough for one day.

"I must go now," she said hurriedly; "I am due at Lady Robinson's in twenty minutes. Au revoir."

And with a smiling nod of farewell she disappeared once more in the crowd.

There are people in the world who say that Lady Dolly is not a clever woman; but I don't agree with them.

ART NOTES.

I WAS referring in this column two or three weeks ago to the way in which the evolution of the Sacred-picture exhibition into a sort of Church service had been carried out of late years in London. The movement is still going on. Mr. Arthur Lucas has gone one better than the Messrs. Dowdeswell; and a visit to "The Great Awakening," by Mr. Herbert Schmalz is even more like a religious function than one paid to Herr Munkacsy's "Ecce Homo." In effect, a pulpit has now been erected in the sacred picture gallery and a well-known divine retained on the establishment, so to speak, to deliver an address to the visitors. Thus, when we go to see "The Great Awakening," a homily, suitable to the occasion, by the Rev. John Watson, M.A., D.D., is placed in our hands, and, to foster still further the idea that one is in church, a copy of an appropriate hymn is also distributed. I have not yet heard of this hymn having been actually sung in front of Mr. Schmalz's canvas, but at any rate there is an offertory—or perhaps I should rather say "a silver collection"—at the doors as the congregation goes in. So that it now only remains for the enterprising picture-gallery proprietor to secure the services of Dr. Parker, or some other minister known to be "powerful in extempore prayer," and the exploitation of the Sacred Picture Show will be virtually complete.

In the present instance, the Rev. John Watson, otherwise better known as "Ian Maclaren," takes his text from the First Epistle to the Corinthians, the twentieth chapter and fifty-first verse. The sermon he delivers on it, which is duly printed in pamphlet form for the edification of every visitor to Ackermann's Gallery, is doubtless what his admirers would call "a braw, bonnie discoorse." The essential points upon which he insists in it are, apparently, that Mr. Herbert Schmalz is an exceptionally excellent painter and that the Reverend John Watson is his interpreter. "When words utterly fail as a mode of expression," he tells us, "then the painter, especially of the mystical order, casts the shadowy aspiration on his canvas in a figure!" But Mr. Herbert Schmalz has done more than this. He has used two figures for his purpose, one representing the Angel of the Resurrection and the other that of a young maiden whom the said Angel is personally conducting—presumably to Paradise. "With a fresh and artistic reserve"—I again quote the homily of the Rev. J. Watson, D.D.:—"the painter has left each person to imagine both the Valley of the Shadow with its agony and the City of God with its joy." Somewhat similar was the ingenious method of the battle painters of a generation or so since—such as Mr. George Jones, R.A., for example—who used to cover their canvases principally with smoke, and thus leave it to spectators to imagine for themselves what sanguinary conflicts were going on beneath its convenient cover. But it is not my intention to enter into any detailed description of Mr. Schmalz's "Great Awakening." I think it only necessary to say about it (as I have said about other popular works of art in this column before), that for those who like this sort of picture, this is pre-eminently the sort of picture they will like.

There is something delightfully fresh and breezy about Mr. W. L. Wyllie's water-colours at the Dowdeswell Gallery. He has studied fair and foul weather—principally fair—to excellent purpose from his floating studio, and it is hard to look at the drawings he has made without again wondering why it was found necessary to confer the post of "Marine Painter to Her Majesty" on an Italian artist some few years since. Anyhow Mr. Wyllie paints the waves as well as Britannia rules them, and is thoroughly at home in the drawing of all sorts and conditions of ships. The picture I least liked in his Exhibition is the largest, a canvas painted in oils, dealing with the Jubilee Naval Review of last summer. How often it is the case that painting to order has a blighting effect on the hand of the artist. Still there is so much that is charming in the collection of pictures shown by Mr. Wyllie, that it would be indeed hard if one refused to forgive him for the one elaborate mistake it contains.

MUSIC.

THE WAGNER OPERA CONDUCTORSHIP.

THE death of Anton Seidl has only temporarily upset the arrangements for the Wagner Festival at Covent Garden. Of course, there are plenty of good men available, better men perhaps than Seidl himself, who although in German opera infinitely superior to the Italians, who hold firmly to the belief that Wagner and noise are identical terms, could, at any rate not claim to be the equal of Mottl or Richter. Hitherto the difficulty at Covent Garden has been to secure a conductor who does not want to monopolise the whole time of rehearsals in the Continental fashion. Abroad, the salaries of bandsmen are comparatively small, less than a fourth of the London tariff, while the manager has the call upon their whole time and services. Besides, on the Continent operatic novelties are comparatively few and a conductor frequently has three or four months in order to prepare them. At Covent Garden the opera has to be changed nearly every night, and although a British orchestra is amazingly quick to grasp the ideas of a conductor, yet if the orchestral chief be fidgety, as most of the minor Continental conductors are, the work cannot be got through.

Of course, so far as the "Ring" performances are concerned, the usual one or two rehearsals will be supplemented, and thus the objection which Mottl in Sir Augustus Harris' time expressed to accept the post of conductor at Covent Garden no longer applies. Richter, too, is thoroughly accustomed to British ways, and has, indeed, conducted operas both at Covent Garden and Drury Lane. Another possible man is Herr Mahler, who is now director of the Opera at Vienna, although he, I believe, would be willing enough to return to London in May and June. Both Richter and Mottl will actually be here at that time, while in the background are Dr. Muck, Stavenhagen, Richard Strauss, Weingärtner (who, by the way, has just accepted a ten years' engagement as conductor of the Kaim concerts at Munich), D'Albert, Nikisch, and others; so that there is no lack of first-rate men. Indeed, the chief difficulty is to choose from among them. Indications seem to point to the selection of Mottl, already one of the conductors of Mr. Schultz Curtius, who is interested in the enterprise. Perhaps Richter would be an all-round better man, and I understand that there is not likely to be the slightest difficulty on the ground either that his services are needed in Vienna or that he is under the managerial control of Mr. Vert. Indeed, Richter is now in Paris in order to conduct a Colonne Concert there, when the matter is to be discussed. Mottl will also be here in a fortnight's time, and the choice practically lies between these two. It should be recollected that although the influence of Mr. Schultz Curtius in such a matter would be great, as representing the Mme. Wagner interests, yet that the responsible parties after all are the Covent Garden Syndicate. Indeed, although it is perfectly true that every seat allotted to the Wagner Party is sold out for the whole three cycles, yet it seems that only 600 places per night were available to Mr. Curtius—or, in other words, about one-third of the house. The rest belongs to the subscribers and the librarians, who are pretty sure to charge a considerable premium for tickets before the performances take place.

A few weeks ago I had plenty of correspondence concerning the smallness of the fees paid to professors of music in general and to organists in particular. The bitter cry is now raised from the ranks of Music Teachers. Sir John Stainer, it is well known, is an advocate of the registration of teachers in order to exclude the incompetent man. Mr. Ernest Newlandsmith, who recently had a successful bout with the Imperial Institute authorities, has a plan which, in point of fact, is trade-unionism pure and simple. He proposes that there shall be a "registered" fee like a solicitor's 6s. 8d., so that musical tuition should be paid for at the rate of four guineas for a course of twelve half-hour lessons, no more and no less. He believes that this scheme would oust the incompetent man, for if a parent had to pay the same fee, whatever the rank of the professor, he would naturally choose the best man available. How this economic idea would suit Mr. Randegger, Mr. Visetti, Miss Bessie Cox, and the other eminent singing teachers is not exactly clear. No doubt their classes, already full, would then be filled to overflowing, though I doubt very much whether their income-tax returns would be so large. To Mr. Newlandsmith and his friends it might, perhaps, be another matter. Nevertheless, one principle of trade-unionism might successfully be adopted in the case of Music Teachers. What they chiefly need is federation and organisation.

The Philharmonic concert last week again drew a comparatively small audience, despite the fact that the rising young Russian pianist, Ossif Gabrilowitsch, was the star of the evening. The Philharmonic people indeed have, beyond much question, made a mistake in fixing all their concerts upon the "unfashionable" Thursdays. Monday or Wednesday, the former Philharmonic nights, would have been a far better choice. M. Gabrilowitsch gave an amazingly vigorous and wonderfully brilliant performance of Liszt's concerto in E flat, with, for an encore, one of Rubinstein's Barcarolles. The orchestral accompaniments to the concerto were, on the other hand, hopelessly below the old Philharmonic average. It would be interesting to investigate the reasons which have led to this now perfectly obvious falling off in the standard of performance of that which once was our representative English orchestra. It may, of course, be due to fossil directors, a too good-tempered conductor, the transfer of some of the best youngsters to the opera, or the dull pitch. Anyhow, that the Philharmonic band could do far better if they liked was proved by a really excellent performance of Dr. Saint-Saëns symphonic poem "Phaëton."

It has been pointed out that the Centenary of the production of Hadyn's "Creation" takes place on the 29th inst. The date, however, is not quite accurate, for although the famous oratorio was given privately in the Schwarzenburg Palace, Vienna, on April 29, 1798, it was not heard in public at the Imperial Opera House, Vienna, until March 19 in the following year. In 1899, no doubt, we shall have a Centenary performance, for, despite its venerable age, the melodies of the "Creation" are still as fresh and pleasant to the ear as ever.

Mr. Cowen's songs are already such public favourites that it hardly needed his song recital on Friday to enhance their popularity, even if a Gargantuan feast of this description did not induce satiety. For thirty-two songs by one composer form rather a severe dose, even to the most inveterate lover of the British ballad. The audience was, however, lucky in the fact that, owing to the illness of one of the artists, eight ballads were omitted. Mr. Cowen, in many of these light and unpretentious though always agreeable works, shows that it is possible to write a drawing-room song with refinement and genuine musicianly feeling.

The Spring Orchestral Concerts at the Crystal Palace never drew very large audiences, and the experience seems this year likely to be repeated. Indeed, it is difficult to understand why the directors should attempt to attract London amateurs at a time when there is a plethora of symphony concerts in London proper. This year Mr. Manns has tried to entice the public by means of familiar programmes of more or less hackneyed works. Also at every concert some eminent artist is engaged. But Londoners have refused to listen to the voice of the charmer, while the local amateur remains apathetic. The Palace management are themselves partly to blame by trying March and April concerts at all, particularly after they had printed and published a ridiculous pamphlet designed for nothing else than to show that the famous concerts were on the down grade. Yet if favourite works could draw the public the concerts ought to be crammed. Last Saturday's programme, for example, was about as good as any one could have drawn up from the popular point of view, although it contained no special novelties. It comprised the "Linz" symphony in C of Mozart, some of the "Rosamunde" music and the Handel "Largo," besides songs for Mme. Lucile Hill, including three musicianly efforts from the pen of a young Royal Academy student upon whom his godfathers and godmothers, thoughtlessly enough, have conferred the wonderful name of "Garnet Wolseley Cox." There were also solos for the young Russian pianist M. Gabrilowitsch. In fact, the pianoforte pieces were quite the most satisfactory things of the day. M. Gabrilowitsch is never heard to greater advantage than in the music of his fellow countryman Tschaikowsky, and he again played that master's B Flat Minor concerto most brilliantly. He was afterwards heard in some Chopin pieces, and in a transcription by Tausig. There will be some big doings at the Palace on Good Friday, when an enormous audience is certain for the afternoon sacred concert. The concert next Saturday might, on the other hand, just as well be abandoned. Audiences are so small on Easter Eve that it was at one time even the practice to devote that day to the production of new works by youthful British composers.

I learn that Mr. Jacobi has relinquished his post as conductor at the Alhambra, a position which he has held for a quarter of a century. The "author of a hundred ballets" will be missed at this home of the dance, but his bright musical fancy will doubtless be in evidence elsewhere. Mr. Jacobi—who is a Berlinese, but studied at the Paris Conservatoire—was originally conductor of the Bouffes in Paris, where he produced two of his operas. The war, however, drove him to England, and he has been here since 1870. His wife, a well-known teacher of stage deportment, was one of the few, and certainly one of the best, pupils of the distinguished danseuse, Mme. Taglioni.

The statements which have gone the rounds concerning the resignation of Mr. Squire as Chief Violoncellist at the Opera are a result of the new policy very properly adopted at Covent Garden, and of which I spoke a few weeks ago. The directors desire to command as far as possible the whole time of the band, and at any rate they have resolved to avoid the annoyance and loss they have so frequently experienced when a rehearsal of a Philharmonic concert has clashed with an important rehearsal of a new opera. Accordingly the band had the choice between eight concerts of the Philharmonic Society and the seventy performances at Covent Garden. All but about a dozen of them, I believe, have wisely stuck to the Opera. The four o'clock Wagner representations no doubt indicate a legitimate grievance, which the liberality of the Covent Garden Syndicate will overcome. It practically is two performances, viz., an afternoon and an evening, and should be paid for accordingly.

M. Paderewski played at the opening of the reconstructed Salle Erard on Saturday. A regular recital at St. James's Hall would have been much better. The tone of the Polish pianist is a great deal too powerfull for so small an apartment.

The last of the Popular Concerts took place on Monday with a Brahms programme, the Joachim Quartet party then making their final appearance this season. It is a pity they did not come earlier in the year, but I believe they are dissatisfied with the usual audiences at the Monday concerts, and will not return next spring. Indeed, the Monday (as distinct from the Saturday) "Pops" want complete reorganising. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel last week gave their final vocal recital. It was extremely well attended and, indeed, there are few more pleasant entertainments than the interesting programmes drawn up by this clever couple. The Bohemian String Quartet Party have given their final concert, and last week Miss Julie Petersen, the Danish flautist who has been personally patronised by the Princess of Wales, made a successful début. The oratorio, "St. David"—I spare the Welsh title—by Mr. David Jenkins, one of the foremost composers of the Principality, was produced by a Welsh choir at the Queen's Hall on Monday. It is a sound and musicianly work, the national feeling being supplied by the use of several real old Welsh folk tunes.

Despite rumours that Sir Arthur Sullivan would be unable, after all, to select a subject for the Leeds Festival this year, he has now authorised the announcement that the work is a secular cantata, and that it will be produced on Saturday afternoon, October 8. It perhaps would have been better if it could first have been heard earlier in the Festival week, and repeated on the Saturday night, as in the case of "The Golden Legend." The other novelties of the Leeds Festival will be a symphonic work, lasting about half an hour, from the pen of Humperdinck, which he will conduct himself (it is hoped with less stage fright than he showed at the Philharmonic Concert last autumn), a new cantata, "Caractacus," by Mr. Elgar, and a new sacred ode, "The Foe Behind, the Deep Before," by Dr. Alan Gray, of Trinity College, Cambridge. There is also to be a "Te Deum," written by Dr. Villiers Stanford to his favourite Latin text. It seems strange that the Royal College composers stick so faithfully to the dead language. It may be glorious, but, as the fate of the "Requiem" has shown, it is not business. The new Pinero and Sullivan "romantic opera," entitled "The Beauty Stone," and in three instead of two acts, will be produced at the Savoy on or about May 14.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—It was quite a relief to me to find that Mr. H. B. Irving's rehabilitation of "Judge Jeffreys" (1) did not canonise the bogey of my boyhood. "Macaulay's schoolboy," though he may not have been as omniscient as the historian, was certainly as cocksure and uncompromising in his judgments, and revelled, therefore, in the famous "black and white style." All the historian's unmitigated sheep or goat, "god or devil" judgments are implicitly accepted in boyhood as natural and unimpeachable, and it is only in after life we make the discovery that Macaulay never tells the truth, but always either very much more or less than the truth. I was not in the least surprised, therefore, to discover from Mr. Irving's admirably-written "Life of Judge Jeffreys" that Macaulay had excelled himself in his raw-head and bloody-bones portraiture of the Chief Justice. Indeed, my surprise was rather that the Judge was not, after the usual fashion of the day, washed white as a new-born lamb. Even in Mr. Irving's portrait, where everything is done to soften the ruffianly fury of this bloodhound, he is a revolting figure. There are a few slips which Mr. Irving might think worth correcting in the next edition of his most interesting work, such as the vulgar use of "aggravate" in the sense of "enrage," of "imperatively" in the sense of "immediately" — as in the phrase "imperatively yielded," applying to a concession a term only applicable to a demand — and the following misquotation from Pope :—

Careless on high stood unabashed Defoe.

No doubt "careless" is historically more correct than what Pope wrote—"earless"—since Defoe was pilloried without the loss of his ears. I hardly know whether or not to recommend to you "Through the Famine Districts of India" (2), because you will find it as heart-harrowing as it is interesting. It is true that Mr. Merewether, Reuter's special Famine Correspondent, has considerately hinted merely at the awful and gruesome scenes it was his business to witness and report upon, yet his account of the monstrous and even murderous dilatoriness and inefficiency of the Government is piteous and at the same time maddening reading. What is to be said for heartless and brainless trifling of this kind :—

It is scarcely conceivable, but none the less a fact, that notwithstanding the very apparent and appalling famine which was prevalent in this district, the Government of India at such a crisis had chosen this time for demanding from the civil authorities of Bilaspur a careful report and returns showing the effect that the present distress was having, or likely to have, upon the cloth industry of the district. The whole of the clerical staff were fully occupied from early morning till dewy eve in preparing the most elaborate and careful statistics upon this all-engrossing topic. In the meantime, the actual inhabitants of Bilaspur were dying of starvation while under the supposed ægis of the Government and within their very gates.

An idiotic Nero, fiddling while Rome burned, is even more hopeless than a tyrant consciously parading his indifference to the conflagration. Even in the poorhouses the wretched natives were starved slowly to death, partly through supineness and mismanagement, and partly through fraud. By the way, did you ever hear, or hear an explanation of, this singular and invariable symptom of approaching death from famine :—

At certain stages of want a fine down of smooth hair appears all over the bodies of the afflicted. It has a most curious look, and gives the wearer a more simian look than ever. When this had once appeared there was no hope for the sufferer. There were more than a score of souls who had reached this stage, and their bodies were covered from head to foot with the soft-looking black fur.

Even if you are not always convinced by Mr. W. H. Mallock's arguments, you will certainly enjoy his "Aristocracy and Evolution" (3), because of the singular clearness and picturesqueness of its presentation of the case against Socialism. The Socialists argue that as feudalism arose out of slavery, and capitalism arose of feudalism, so will socialism arise out of capitalism; but they are reminded that slavery, feudalism, and capitalism agree to differ from socialism in the one essential point. Under all three exceptional strength, intellect, and energy controlled, and were exceptionally rewarded for controlling, the average many. The few always led, though they led in right of different powers—at first in right of fighting power, then of legislative power, and then of industrial power. Incomparably the most brilliant and sympathetic account of "The Thirty Days' War Between Greece and Turkey" (4) of the many I have read is that which Mr. Henry W. Nevinson has compiled out of his special correspondence for the Daily Chronicle. In reading this thrilling and heart-breaking narrative you have again and again the misgiving that the charges of vapouring and cowardice with which the Powers have overwhelmed Greece might, with infinitely more justice, be retorted upon the Powers :—

On the field and in finance the ruin of Greece was complete. Committed helplessly by the King into the hands of the Powers, she had practically ceased to be a nation. If they had dared to consummate the crime which they had inaugurated by their jealousies and hatred of liberty, they might have left her again bodily to the possession of the Turk, and she could hardly have protested. And, indeed, in that case she would have been delivered from the politicians and foreign financiers who prey upon her life, and in a few years we might have seen an uprising of the whole nation, compared to which the War of Independence seventy years ago was child's play.

How the inaction of the Greek fleet and the mishandling of the Greek forces should be the mystery it seems to have been to Mr. Nevinson I cannot understand, when the other trickeries and treacheries of their King and of the Powers is so clear to his eyes. Jews, in the vulturous part of bondholders, had probably as much to do with the Greek disasters as the Powers, and as the race will have to be taken into account more and more in politics, it is as well to study our masters. There are, however, pleasanter reasons than this for my recommending to you Mr. Zangwill's powerful and suggestive series of Jewish portraits, "Dreamers of the Ghetto" (5). The most interesting is naturally that of the most interesting of all modern Jews, Heine, who, however, justified amply his own boast of being the most cosmopolitan of men :—

I am a Jew, I am a Christian. I am Tragedy, I am Comedy—Heraclitus and Democritus in one; a Greek, a Hebrew; an adorer of despotism as incarnate in Napoleon; an admirer of Communism as embodied in Proudhon; a Latin, a Teuton; a beast, a devil, a god.

And so, in truth, he was. Different indeed in the kind, though not in the degree, of its interest is J. K. Huysman's "Cathedral" (6), which Mrs. Bell has translated and Mr. Kegan Paul has edited. It is a little too much however, to be asked to accept unreservedly Mr. Kegan Paul's doctrine, that "the strife between Durtal and the Catholic Religion is the struggle between vice and virtue, not between two different modes of serving God. . . . The general view of the matter may be summed up in the words of an hotel-keeper in a Burgundian town :—'Ah, sir, I hope you are not a Protestant. There are only three Protestants in this town, and they are all persons of indifferent lives.'" Finally let me commend to your notice some new fiction which is specially calculated to while away an idle hour. There is Mr. Manville Fenn's latest story, "A Woman Worth Winning" (7), a stirring modern drama of love and madness. Then in "Across the Salt Seas" (8), a story of the days of Marlborough, Mr. Bloundelle Burton has managed to catch the very essence of the true romantic spirit. Another new novel, Mr. Jephson's curious blend of modernity and romance, is consistently amusing, though to some tastes the morals of his "Keepers of the People" (9) may seem just a little too Oriental. Should none of these just meet your taste, a dip into the pages of "Under One Cover" (10) cannot fail to provide you with entertainment. A series of bright original stories such as are contained in this volume, is always welcome.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—We have managed to spend a very interesting week, though you will find London described as extremely dull in most of the Society papers. It is dull, I believe, for everybody who can manage it is basking in sunshine in the South of France. If somebody would only leave us a thousand pounds we would escape an English winter ourselves in that agreeable way next year. We love our London dearly, however, and have explored fresh portions since I wrote you last. The Marchioness of Dufferin opened a new branch of the Children's Happy Evenings Association last Tuesday evening at Ponton-road, Nine Elms, and having received an invitation from Miss Edith Heather-Bigg, the hon. secretary, and, I believe, the originator of the Association, we wended our way to Vauxhall Station and thence down Nine Elms-lane to the scene of action. It is a very poor neighbourhood, and the houses are small and dingy. Among them we noticed a very quaint and beautiful old gateway, and, on asking what it was, were told that it once was the entrance to the Greencoat School, but now belongs to a distillery. There is a saint, or the statue of some benevolent person, in a niche above the doorway. How puzzled the poor saint must be to find himself superintending the passage of casks of spirits instead of small children!

At Ponton-road we found a company of children assembled in a very large room of the district Board school, the little creatures all expectation. "A happy evening" has a tempting sound, even to the youngsters in roomy and comfortable homes. What such an evening means to the children of the crowded poor it is difficult to gauge. The little girls were almost all neatly dressed, but the little boys not so much so. There are difficulties about boys' clothes when poverty rules the supply. When Lady Dufferin arrived, the good girl of the school presented her with a bouquet of daffodils, and after a few words of introduction from the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. Montague Barlow, the Marchioness made a nice little speech to the children, in a low but very distinct voice, telling them that, in order to know how to play, they must know how to be gentle, good-tempered, self-denying, and considerate—cushions not corners, in fact, as in the old story. With Lady Dufferin was her pretty daughter, Lady Hermione Blackwood, and among other ladies present were the Countess of Iddesleigh, Lady Howard de Walden, the Hon. Mrs. Newdigate, Lady Samuelson, and other members of the Executive Committee. Lady Jersey was "chairman." After the speeches, the children began to play, some of them taking hands in a circle and dancing round some object in the centre, which it was the aim of every player to knock over. Others went into a large room where drawing-slates were provided for them, and a large party elected to be drafted off into another room where Miss Ada Heather-Bigg told them a story. It was the very first evening of the kind in that district, and the children have, in many cases, to be taught how to play. Fun does not enter much into their clouded little lives. All honour to the sweet, good women who try to relieve the gloom that poverty spreads over them!

There are now fifty-nine branches of the Happy Evenings Association, at which over 9,000 children are made happy with healthy recreation in the large rooms of the Board schools, which would otherwise be useless and empty in the evenings. The game of keeping shop is found to be a great favourite, and dolls are provided for the girls of tender age. The children are encouraged to make small presents for their parents out of old Christmas cards, turning them into covers of needlebooks, and making pincushions out of scraps of silk. All kinds of odds and ends come in very usefully, and you might remember the "Happy Evenings" when you are turning out those accumulations of etceteras on which one has periodically to make onslaught. If parents would follow the example of the Duchess of York (who is President of the Association), and send their children's left-off toys to the schools, there would be a considerable increase in the materials for manufacturing happiness on these occasions, a manufacture which requires some skill and experience, as well as kind-heartedness and active goodwill.

Money is wanted. With so many millionaires scattered about London, such a state of things should not exist. For every pound subscribed, twenty children can have a weekly happy evening for a period of seven months. If you know any one who wishes to deal in happiness as a marketable commodity, purveying it by cheque to those who need it, tell them that their contributions may be sent to Mr. Montague Barlow, 12, King's Bench-walk, Temple.

On Wednesday afternoon we spent two delightful hours at the first flower show of the season—the show of spring flowers at the Botanical Gardens. Never have I been more impressed with the incalculable vagaries of our mysterious climate. But three or four days earlier we had been in mid-winter, shivering over the fire as we looked out at the driving squalls of snow and sleet dashed against the windows by the pitiless breath of the north-easterly gale. On Wednesday we were basking at the Botanical Gardens under the balmiest of spring sunshine and listening to the 1st Life Guards' band with quite a summer-like sensation of indolence. As for the flowers, I should have to give up my whole letter to them to do them justice. Though nominally a spring show, there were splendid exhibits of roses, as well as orchids and cliveas and other exotics—the florist in these days knows nothing of seasons. But, to my thinking, the real spring flowers came out the best of all, and among them none made a more entrancing show than the narcissus. Even without a flower show, however, the Botanic Society's gardens are one of the most delightful spots in London, and on a bright spring day, with the birds singing all around, and not a trace of smoke overhead, you can sit there and imagine yourself hundreds of miles from London. It was a selfish thing to shut the public out of this Eden for so long, and the Society deserved to suffer for it, just as it deserves to profit by the more liberal and generous policy which now prevails.

On Thursday afternoon we went to the Comedy to see Mrs. Bernard-Beere in "Masks and Faces," and found a brilliant house assembled in good time to see the first act of "Peril," which preceded Charles Reade's delightful play. Mrs. Beerbohm Tree, as Lady Ormonde, wore a sweet gown in pure white in some soft material that fell in lovely folds. The front of the bodice was filled in with beige-tinted lace with a pink rose tucked in the pale blue sash. Mrs. Bernard-Beere's dresses as Peg Woffington were most successful. I do not know any actress who puts herself, it would seem unconsciously, into such picturesque attitudes as Mrs. Bernard-Beere. In the first act she wore a Dresden China sort of costume, or Watteau shepherdess, the gown of grey and blue brocade being bunched up over a front of white satin painted in a design of pink and white roses. The hat was an inspiration. It was white or palest blue satin, the brim lined with the same and crossed by diagonal lines of red, the tint matching the velvet waistcoat and the narrow ruching on the double cape of the gown. Even more becoming was the tomato-red dress in the supper scene, Mrs. Bernard-Beere's tall figure giving value to the graceful lines in which the soft red silk fell from the waist. There was a long trained over-dress of velvet in a deeper tone of red, and embroidered in long lines of roses and green leaves. A kind of vest of brown and green beads held the silken folds at the waist. The square bodice was held with a great diamond star at one side, and a similar ornament was fastened in the hair. In the last act, the under-dress is beige lace, a material beloved of artistic folk, with over-dress of old rose damask, the tones being poetically soft and dull. Peg's brogue was delicious, and her slippers were enchanting. With the beige lace she wore orange silk stockings and kid shoes to match, the jig she dances giving opportunities of studying chaussure.

The seventh annual "At Home" of the Children's Salon is to be held at the Westminster Town Hall, Victoria-street, on Saturday April 16, when the usual programme will be gone through, to the time of beating girlish hearts. The competitions will be got over in the morning, when a distinguished array of judges will decide as to the winners of the various prizes. Very interesting things are among the prizes, for instance, necklaces of Orient pearls for the best skirt-dancers, brooches of different descriptions, silver-backed brushes and hand-mirrors, sets of Shakespeare and Tennyson, ostrich-feather fans, &c.: well worth trying for. There will be a flutter in the dovecotes that morning!

New Spring Fashions.—Messrs. Redfern have now on view in their Showrooms a unique display of Toilettes, illustrative of the latest London and Paris fashions, and to which they invite an inspection.—26, Conduit-street, London, W.

This is the time for new gowns of every kind, new skirts, new matinées, new everything, is it not? Even men are going to their tailors in an endless procession, unconsciously inspired by the breath of April and the inner conviction of the inappropriateness of shabby garb to the first sweet days of spring. We have been industriously making a round of the shops, and procuring for ourselves those comparatively light and cool garments that supersede winter clothes and precede summer raiment. It is a not disagreeable interval. I love Easter with its hopeful brightness and the cheeriness of an awaking world. And it is plea-ant to feel that one's attire is fresh and in harmony with Nature's new spring toilette.

We saw such sweet sunshades at Sykes Josephine's—little poems, dear. They were made of chiffon in all possible shades, and can be ordered to match any dress. One was in pink chiffon, with the wooden stick enamelled to match, and a very sweet handle of transparent red crystal. This stick and handle can be reproduced in any colour.

Miss Peggie Mactear is to be married on the 30th at St. Margaret's, Westminster, to Mr. Edward Powell, of Oakbank, Cheshire. The wedding will be a smart one, and there will be hosts of friends present, for the bride-elect and her mother are extremely popular, and know everybody. There is to be a reception after the ceremony, at the Grafton Gallery, which is this year in greater demand than ever for such functions.

Some high-born amateurs have resolved to benefit the funds of H.R.H. Princess Christian's Home for Trained Nurses at Windsor by a dramatic performance of "The Home Secretary," to be given at the Matinée Theatre, St. George's place, on Thursday evening, May 12, and Friday evening, May 13. Among those who will play parts are Lady Helena Douglas Hamilton, Lady Mary Pepys, the Hon. Ethel Cadogan, Mrs. Norton, Captain Ulick Browne, and Captain Norton. The Prince and Princess Edward of Saxe-Weimar have given their patronage, besides several of our Dukes and Duchesses and a long list of Marchionesses and Countesses. It is going to be a very smart affair.

Have you seen the new periodical, The World of Fashion? It comes out weekly, and is all about dress, with any number of illustrations and the brightest possible gossip about chiffons. Clever Mrs. Aria edits it, and sheds the glow of her merry mood over it all. It is just the thing for you to take in down in the country, where it is difficult to keep up with fashion's vagaries unless you supply yourself with constant, reliable information on the subject.

In Piccadilly on Saturday we met a man who wore the new moustache. It is an interesting variety of hirsute adornment, and you must tell your brother all about it. Your husband, being a clergyman, will not seriously incline to such frivolities. The new moustache is butterfly-shaped, the solidly compact arrangement in the centre representing the body, and the ends the wings. These were brushed out in a fringe, each hair of which was distinct, and this fringe took an upward direction, and rested on the cheek. The effect was decidedly out of the common.

Apropos to novelties of this kind, Raoul has just had a show of artistic and historical coiffures, and also of various little contrivances for beautifying the human head feminine, such as fringes and nuques of the most distractingly pretty sort—quite an armoury of coquettish weapons.

The worst of wearing this kind of thing must be the horror with which the natural woman must behold herself in the glass when she has taken off all the etceteras and accidently catches sight of her real self, for she would never have conrage to deliberately scan her appearance without the supplementary charms that make such a difference. And then, one's maid! With what a shiver one must contemplate her inmost impressions about one.

When you are choosing materials for dresses, be sure to ask for those with a pirle finish Don't forget the word, which is an unusual one. It means a particnlarly fine finish, which not only enables the fabrics to which it is applied to retain their gloss for ever so long, but preserves them from the ill effects of a shower of rain.

The new tea-gowns are of a most tempting description. They showed us one in honeysuckle-coloured brocade made in a quite new shape, fitting closely to the figure, and trimmed with yellowish thread lace in a very graceful way. The front was all pink chiffon with insertions of lace across it. The sleeves were also rather new, being double in effect. Long, fully-gathered sleeves of the chiffon were topped by short ones made of puffings of the brocade. A pretty breakfast-gown was made of ondulé pongee silk. Do you know this material? It has all the appearance of having been accordion-pleated, but this effect is secured in the making of the silk. It thus clings closely to the figure defining it very daintily. The gown is trimmed with lace and blue ribbons, the insertions being perpendicular. We noticed some very inexpensive tea-gowns with Watteau backs and in silks of every colour trimmed with ruches of lace, and made with such pretty sleeves widening out slightly below the elbows where they are daintily finished with lace and chiffon These gowns are lined throughout with muslin in the same colour as the silk of which they are composed.

A handsome teagown or reception dress was made of black brocade, the pleat at the back being held in to the figure by means of rich jet ornaments. The front was trimmed with long, shaped pieces of green velvet elaborately embroidered with jet. Beginning at the neck, these pieces slope off at either side, the ends disappearing under the folds of the Watteau at the back. The collar and sleeves of this gown were remarkably pretty.

We had quite an orgie of silk blouses in all the newest and most attractive tones of colour. These are handmade, and have tucks across the front and back. All were different, some having frills down the front, and others being made with revers, lace-edged. One was pink, another blue, a third mauve, and so on, the chief point of similarity being that all were made of glacé silk of a peculiarly brilliant description. Silk petticoats with deep, accordion-pleated flounces, were displayed in bewildering variety, making choice an embarrassment. Their delightful lightness makes these skirts a pleasant change after the necessary warmth of winter ones.

Christabel writes from Paris:—

We passed a charming afternoon the day before yesterday at the Comtesse de Kessler's, when the long-promised performance of "La Dame aux Camélias" took place. The pretty little drawing-room stage was beautifully decorated and upholstered. The hostess took the part of Marguerite Gautier, and in the first scene wore a lovely deep emerald green robe of fleur de velours, softened with tulle of the same shade; the front of the bodice and tablier sparkled with jewels of all colours embroidered on the tulle. The long net sleeves were unlined, but drawn and puckered with a little fulled heading running up the outer seam. In the second act, Marguerite wore an elegant morning gown of white lace, with a Watteau pleat at the back, over the palest tint of mauve. The third dress was lovely rose pink, embroidered and brocaded all over with shaded flowers and leaves, softened with pink gauze and long sleeves of the same.

In the ball-room scene there was quite a sensation when Marguerite entered in a magnificent dress of white tulle over satin, the tulle sprinkled all over with large, glittering, diamond dewdrops. She wore a spray of white camellias on the left side of the low bodice, and the same flowers formed a garland round the foot of the skirt. The Comtesse wore a black velvet dog-collar, with superb real diamonds, and a band of the same was in her fair hair, with a star in front; it was a most lovely dress, and suited the beautiful wearer. Mme. J., who played Olympe, was in green moire, the bodice handsomely spangled and ornamented. In the dying scene Marguerite appeared in an exquisite lace dressing-gown, covered with a sheath of ermine from head to foot. I say sheath, for I find no other word for the garment; without sleeves, slightly open in front, designing the elegant outline of the figure, without a seam, fulness, or crease being visible.

Now for a few of the pretty gowns worn by the guests. One was of black lace guipure over pale pink. The lace was shaped in princess form and quite untrimmed. The toque worn with it was in black spangled lace, and was slightly raised at the left side with a row of pink roses resting on the hair.

A silver grey cashmere gown was enhanced by white embroidery in relief, executed in white wool over grey faille. This went all round the skirt and up in a garland on each side of the tablier. The bodice had small basques and a white silk belt. The revers were of white guipure striped with white satin, opening in front over a chemisette of pale blue silk muslin. A charming little turban hat of grey tulle with straight black feathers spangled with steel was worn with this.

A costume of fine beige cloth was made with soft long pleats in the skirt. The bodice had a rounded yoke of Oriental embroidery, with a pattern in white kid, following the outline of the yoke, and down one side of the skirt. A toque of lavender blue velvet with black satin chou and a blue aigrette was worn with this. A rich black fleur de velours, with a plain skirt, had revers on the bodice of black satin, edged with a border of very rich and sparkling steel embroidery. The capote was black, with mauve flowers and feathers.

A blue foulard, with a pattern of lilies of the valley in white, had on the skirt small flounces of miroir-blue taffetas. The bodice was of the same taffetas, with handsome white guipure laid on over the silk, and a white satin waistband. A blue straw hat, trimmed with lilies of the valley, finished this rather spring-like costume.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin :—

Dearest Madge,—The question is not "Are you going anywhere for Easter?" but "Where are you going?" The going is taken for granted. Easter is a season at which, without in any way consulting our own tastes and inclinations, we are under the social—selectly social—obligation to go somewhere—to leave, at least, the place of our habitual abiding. The tradition of Christmas—a good deal menaced of late—requires us to stay by our own firesides; that of Easter, on the contrary, demands our forsaking them in favour of other people's houses and pleasure resorts in our own kingdom or abroad. A general change there must be, as in the game of "posts." Let each one be where he was not. Which, perhaps, would take many of the "best set" back to their own homes. For it may well be said in these days, that when it is not homely there is no place like home. What a thing of the past the old, quiet, home life is! Crowded, nd crushed, and rushed out of existence almost! Supposing that ne possibly could have a weakness for anything so old-fashioned, how deep down in the secret depths of the heart one would keep the absurd feeling. Who could stand against the imputation of having spent a whole year, or even six months, at a stretch in one's own home? And as to having enjoyed the experience—well, if one were capable of such an excess of dowdiness one might just as well retire from the stage of Society at once.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that we are not going to spend Easter at home, but are betaking ourselves to the country amongst the primroses and the lambs, exchanging the noises of town for the singing of birds and the distant sound of the sea. There is no festivity this week in Dublin, but afterwards an outbreak of gaiety will culminate in the whirl of Punchestown week. Lord and Lady Cadogan will be at the Viceregal Lodge for the racing carnival; four race days in one week is a good enough record. April is still early for out-door amusements; its traditional capriciousness makes the Punchestown and Leopardstown costumes difficult to plan. One's mind gets so torn with doubts, so tormented with possibilities regarding the weather and impossibilities regarding one's costumes. It is so difficult to bring the weather and the dress into harmony. The week—experience has taught us—may be anything from glacially wintry to softly and sunnily summerlike. And then all the degrees that lie between. In fact one would need the mind and the method of Alice's "White Knight" to prepare what would then no doubt reach the magnitude of a trousseau, for the week. Do you like the return to long dresses? They are not at all in keeping with the spirit of the age, but a going back to more old-fashioned and inactive ideas regarding woman. Draperies in excess do not suit taking life actively. I imagine a man trailing about in long garments. They are in our way, too, now that our pursuits are mostly manly, and we no longer languish, faint gracefully and recline on couches in elegant idleness. Whether or not we are doing any better than our grandmothers did, we are certainly doing it more vehemently and with more expenditure of muscle. Indeed, these respected ladies, with regard to the latter, can hardly have had any muscle to expend, and would have looked on the development of it as very unladylike. Will the twentieth century women look on us as very poor things, and on our most advanced and newest women as terribly behind the times? No doubt it will come to that. And what imagination is powerful enough to picture what these women of the future will be.

The Meath Hunt Races at Navan were the principal social event of last week, and brought together all the elect of the county and many others. The Ward Hunt Races at Fairy House always take place on Easter Monday, and are the most important that precede those at Punchestown. They are nearly always patronised by Viceroyalty, with a party and large suite in attendance. Lord and Lady Roberts, who have entertained hospitably at Kilmainham during the season, are going for a change with their family to Abbeyleix. Lord de Vesci having lent them his house for several weeks. Do you remember the Poet Laureate's description of the gardens and the bluebell-carpeted woods of Abbeyleix? It was not poetry, and none the worse perhaps for that.

Lord de Vesci has come in for a small portion of Lord Carlingford's property, but not for Ravensdale, a fine house in the county of Louth, which has gone to Lord Congleton. It has one of those long avenues which were the pride of the old Irish landlords, and are the despair of their descendants, so expensive to keep up, and so inconvenient in an age that no longer appreciates the exclusiveness of isolation. Lord Congleton, who is the General in command at Malta, where he is living with Lady Congleton and his family, has not yet taken possession of his new residence. He is the head of the Parnell family to which the great Irish leader belonged.

Mrs. Parnell, the mother of Charles Stewart Parnell, who died last week at Avondale, was a clever woman, of strong individuality, an American by birth. She was buried in Glasnevin Cemetery, where her son, O'Connell, and many other celebrated Irishmen rest. The floral tribute sent by the American Ambassador, Colonel Hay, was one of the most beautiful wreaths laid on her grave. At one time a leading member of Irish Society, Mrs. Parnell went through many vicissitudes in her long life.—

Yours ever, Clare.

Frances writes from Brighton :—

Dearest Madge,—The ice rink is to be kept open till April 16, that is, for Easter; it would have been a pity if Brighton had been shorn of one of its greatest attractions just at that holiday season. On Tuesday (March 29) we all went to see Mr. George A. Meagher give one of his marvellous exhibitions of fancy and figure skating. You, of course, have seen him, but to us his cleverness was quite a surprise. There were a number of smart people looking on. You do not know our local celebrities, so their names would not interest you. Among the visitors we noticed Lady Archie Campbell in one of the costumes she usually affects—blouse and toque to match of white brocaded silk, with a velvet skirt; wearing on Thursday (when there was a capital hockey match) a blue silk blouse and toque, with a dark coloured skirt.

The hockey matches are always exciting. This was between the Brighton Ice Skating Club team—now such a strong one—and one composed of officers of the Royal Sussex Regiment, quartered at Preston Barracks. Brighton won very easily by eleven goals to two. Sir William Call, Mr. Duncan Furner, the Hon. McClintock Bunbury, Captain Johnson, and Mr. Cumberledge composed the Brighton team; Mr. Ashworth, Mr. Anderson, Captain Jellicorse, Mr. Gouldsmith, and Captain Blake that of the Royal Sussex. There is a talk of getting up ladies' hockey matches next season, but I hardly think we have enough good skaters as yet to make much of a show. It looks so easy to skate, does it not? But is far from being as easy as it looks.

Brighton will be very full for Easter, I hear, and if we have a continuation of this glorious weather it will be charming. Why not run down for a few days?

Have you any time for recipes this week? You will find this "orange cake" quite new and very delicious:—

For the cake:—Beat 4 oz. of butter with 4 oz. of sugar until creamy, beat in 2 eggs separately, mix in 4 oz. of flour, and the zest of an orange rubbed on sugar and pounded. Bake the cake in a small round tin about an hour, then leave it to cool. Divide half a dozen Jaffa oranges in their natural divisions, free from pips, sprinkle them with castor sugar and a dessertspoonful of maraschino. After standing for an hour, mix the fruit lightly with half a pint of stiffly-whipped cream, sweetened and flavoured with maraschino. At the moment of serving, cut the cake into slices half an inch thick, put a layer in the bottom of a dish, cover it with the orange and cream; repeat the process until all the ingredients are used, making fruit and cream the last layer.

Herring roes preserved in tins are a great delicacy, and very useful in an emergency. They can be dressed in this way:—

Stand the tin containing the roes in a stewpan of hot water for a few minutes. Then open the tin and turn the roes carefully on to a buttered baking tin, sprinkle them with a very little scraped shalot, a spoonful of chopped and blanched parsley, and a little lemon juice. Put the tin in the oven for five minutes, then dish the roes on strips of toast, previously spread with anchovy butter; sprinkle them with a little passed lobster coral, arrange them on a dish paper and garnish them with fried parsley.

Ever, dear, your loving cousin, MADGE.

NEW MEDICAL NOVEL.

The Academy says: "It brings Bob Sawyer and Ben Allen up to date."

TREWINNOT OF GUY'S.
By Mrs. COULSON KERNAHAN.
Cloth gilt, 6s.

First Edition exhausted on day of publication. Second Edition now ready. Third Edition in rapid preparation.

FIRST REVIEW, March 24th.

Scotsman.—"Admirably conceived, as bringing into view all sorts and conditions of medical men in London. The book yields in interest to none of those by which its author has secured her reputation."

THE STORY OF LOIS.
By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID, Author of "Patty," "At the Red Glove," &c.
Cloth gilt, 6s.

 Of the many stories Mrs. Macquoid has written, "The Story of Lois" has been pronounced her best by competent critics.

ALL THEY WENT THROUGH.
By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "Grandmother's Money," "Young Nin," &c.
Cloth gilt, 6s.

 A Second Edition is ready to-day, the first having been exhausted on the day of publication.

NEW BOOKS.

Demy 8vo, cloth, price 12s. 6d.

ARISTOCRACY AND EVOLUTION.
A Study of the Rights, the Origin, and the Social Functions of the Wealthier Classes. By W. H. MALLOCK, Author of "Labour and the Popular Welfare," "Classes and Masses," &c.

"He does not envelop the subject in a cloud of philosophic phraseology, he is always lucid and orderly, and he relieves his argument by welcome touches of satire and humour. His last book shows no deficiency in these qualities and it is also perhaps the most complete and sustained effort of reasoning which he has so far produced."—Literature.

THE STORY OF GLADSTONE'S LIFE.
By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P. Containing 45 Illustrations, mostly Page Portraits, representing Mr. Gladstone at different periods. In 1 vol., extra crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, price 7s. 6d.

"This is a charmingly written sketch of Mr. Gladstone's public career, with some interesting glimpses at the same time into his private life."—The Observer.

HIS GRACE O' THE GUNNE.
By I. HOOPER, Author of "A Singer of Marly." Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

An Annual Biographical Dictionary. FIFTIETH YEAR OF ISSUE. Containing 1,143 New Biographies. In crown 8vo, 864 pages, bound in cloth gilt, with gilt edges and rounded corners price 3s. 6d. net.

"This is undoubtedly the handiest biographical dictionary and compendium of information, referring to prominent persons and their doings, in existence."—Nature.

ROME, HANDBOOK to CHRISTIAN and ECCLESIASTICAL.
By H. M. and M. A. R. T. Part II.—The Liturgy in Rome. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

"This guide-book is in its department very complete, and it is crammed full of curious learning."—Literary World.

THE VITALITY OF CHRISTIAN DOGMAS.
By A. SABATIER, D.D., Dean of the Faculty of Protestant Theology, Paris. Translated by Mrs. Em. Christen. With Preface by the Very Reverend the Hon. W. H. Fremantle, D.D., Dean of Ripon. Crown 8vo, 96 pages, cloth, price 1s. 6d. net.

"Is really a gem of theological constructive criticism. With marvellous lucidity and penetration Dr. Sabatier states for us here the philosophy and natural history of the dogma; its position and use in the Christian evolution."—Christian World.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho-square, London.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE LONDONERS: AN ABSURDITY

By ROBERT HICHENS, Author of "The Green Carnation."

The Daily Telegraph.—"Should be read by every one in search of a laugh. Mr. Hichens simply revels in epigram, simile, and satire."

DREAMERS OF THE GHETTO.

By I. ZANGWILL.

Mr. W. E. Henley in the Outlook.—"A brave, eloquent, absorbing, and, on the whole, persuasive book, whose author tells you as much, perhaps, as has before been told in modern literature. Here, I take it, is that rarest of rare things, a BOOK. As I have said, I do not wholly believe in it. But it is a book; it goes far to explain the Jew."

THE LAKE OF WINE.

By BERNARD CAPES.

THE WAR OF THE WORLDS.

By H. G. WELLS, Author of "The Time Machine."

The Spectator.—"As a writer of scientific romance, Mr. Wells has never been surpassed. Even when he is most awful there is always something human about his characters. Both Poe and Mr. Wells are followers of Swift, but Mr. Wells keeps nearest to the human side of the author of 'Gulliver.'"

THE MINISTER OF STATE.

By J. A. STEUART, Author of "In the Day of Battle."

The World.—"Its qualities place it far above the novels we are accustomed to, even of the higher class. It is dramatic, romantic, and realistic."

KING CIRCUMSTANCE.

By EDWIN PUGH, Author of "A Street in Suburbia.'

THE SCOURGE-STICK.

By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED.

The Daily Telegraph.—"Undeniably powerful and interesting."

THE BROOM OF THE WAR-GOD.

By H. N. BRAILSFORD.

The World.—"Quite the most vivid and most realistic picture of the lamentable Græco-Turkish campaign that we have yet met with. We follow the fortunes of the Foreign Legion with absorbed interest."

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford-street, W.C.

BOOKS TO BUY.

FAME THE FIDDLER.

A REALISTIC NOVEL. By S. J. ADAIR FITZGERALD. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A novel of more than average merit. Cleverly written and intensely interesting throughout."—WESTERN DAILY PRESS.

"Written in the happiest manner, by turns humorous and pathetic, by one who evidently understands his subject thoroughly."—LADY.

"A pleasant cheery story. Displays a rich vein of robust imagination."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

THE MOST WEIRD AND STARTLING STORY OF THE DAY.

THE DEVIL IN A DOMINO.

CHAS. L'ÉPINE. Cloth, 1s.

"A well-written story. An admirable literary style, natural and concise construction, succeed in compelling the reader's attention through every line. We hope to welcome the author again working on a larger scene."—SKETCH.

THE ART OF ELOCUTION

AND PUBLIC SPEAKING. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s.

Written by ROSS FERGUSON. Introduction by GEORGE ALEXANDER.

"A useful little book. We strongly recommend it to the chairmen of public companies."—AUSTRALIAN MAIL.

MISS BETTY'S MISTAKE.

By ADELINE SERGEANT, Author of "The Claim of Anthony Lockhart," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Now ready, in 1 vol. crown 8vo, 6s.

MERESIA.

By WINIFRED GRAHAM, Author of "A Strange Solution," &c.

"There is much that is clever and original in Miss Winifred Graham's latest book. Meresia is an interesting and a life-like character, and the two Spaniards, Aladros and Serano, are also well drawn. The book is well worth reading, if only for the picture it gives us of 'the fascination of hate.'"—Daily Telegraph.

NEW NOVEL BY LEWIS SERGEANT.

Now ready, in 1 vol. crown 8vo, 6s.

THE CAPRICE OF JULIA.

By LEWIS SERGEANT.

"In reading 'The Caprice of Julia,' one is especially struck by the excellence of the style; it is at once easy, flowing, and in phrase and tone eminently characteristic of the supposed autobiographer, the admiring young gentleman who is made to feel most keenly 'the caprice of Julia.' Altogether, the book, being freshly and agreeably written, is sure to find admirers."—Globe.

THE KLONDYKE AND COLUMBIAN GOLDFIELDS, LTD.

AND THE

DAWSON CITY & DOMINION TRADING CORPORATION, LTD.

IN CONJUNCTION WITH THE

Klondyke & Columbian Passenger Agency

are now BOOKING PASSENGERS, FIRST-CLASS all through, to KLONDYKE for a stated sum, including in such amount a COMPLETE KLONDYKE MINER'S OUTFIT (hitherto unknown in England), a TENT and MEDICINE CHEST, and sufficient PROVISIONS to last for ONE YEAR. Even the meals and sleeping berths on the Canadian Pacific Railway have been arranged for by the Agency without further payment by the passenger.

The aim of the Ageney has been to secure that the journey to Klondyke should not be much more troublesome than a trip on the Continent, and in the shortest time possible. The route which has been arranged for after personal inquiry and negotiation on the Pacific Coast, is quicker and easier than any other.

The Directors believe that such a comprehensive scheme as the one arranged by the Agency to meet the demand for a journey of this magnitude, at a reasonable cost, has not before been attempted in the history of Passenger Agencies. The intending gold-seeker can leave Liverpool with no more luggage than a Gladstone bag. Every necessary is provided for him from the day he leaves England. He is met by officials in connection with the Agency at New York, the Agency's officials on the Pacific coast meet him on arrival at Vanconver, and, taking him in charge, outfit and provision him at the Company's Depot at Victoria. He is then taken by steamer to Dyea and Personally Conducted through to Lake Lindeman. Here a boat is in waiting with his provisions for a year and a complete outfit, and he then proceeds down stream to Dawson City.

FOR THE THROUGH BOOKING, OCEAN STEAMER, RAILWAY, COMPLETE OUTFIT, PROVISIONS FOR A YEAR, CONVEYANCE OF FREIGHT, SERVICES AS BEFORE MENTIONED, &c., THE INCLUSIVE CHARGE OF £300 IS MADE.

The Route is as follows, and is First Class All Through, and Bookings will be made by this Route ALL THE YEAR ROUND:—

LIVERPOOL TO NEW YORK.
White Star Liner, saloon.
NEW YORK TO VANCOUVER.*
Canadian Pacific Railway, including meals and sleeping berth from Montreal, which is 12 hours from New York.
* At Vancouver passengers will be met by the officials of the Klondyke and Columbian Passenger Agency, who will take them in charge to Victoria.
VANCOUVER TO VICTORIA. †
Canadian Pacific Steamers.
† At Victoria passengers will receive their outfit and provisions, properly packed by experienced packers. They will then be personally conducted through to Lake Lindeman.

VICTORIA TO DYEA.
Washington and Alaska Steamship Company. This Company employs only the oldest and most experienced pilots and captains.
DYEA TO LAKE LINDEMAN.
Railroad and tramway (Chilkoot Railroad and Transport Company).

EXTRACTS FROM "KLONDYKE: A GUIDE TO THE NEW ELDORADO,"

PUBLISHED BY THE KLONDYKE AND COLUMBIAN PASSENGER AGENCY, PRICE 6d. (Post Free 7 stamps).

1. ABOUT THE GOLDFIELDS.

Actual results have demonstrated beyond doubt the boundless wealth which exists in the Klondyke district of the Dominion of Canada. The well-known Canadian official, Mr. William Ogilvie, whose reliability is unquestioned, says:—

"The richness of the country is beyond dispute. I have no hesitation in saying that there are £20,000,000 in sight to-day, tested and proved, not to speak of what may be found the next year or the year after. It will take years merely to prospect the country. There are 7,000,000 miles of territory. [The total area of the United Kingdom is 121,481 square miles.]

"Bonanza and Eldorado creeks afford between them 278 claims; the several affluents will yield as many more, and all of these claims are good. I have no hesitation in saying that 100 of those on Bonanza will yield upwards of 30,000,000 dols. Claim thirty on Eldorado will yield a million in itself, and ten others will yield from 100,000 dols. upwards. These two creeks will, I am quite confident, turn out from 60,000,000 dols. to 75,000,000 dols., and I can safely say that there is no other region in the world of the same extent that has afforded in the same length of time so many homestakes—fortunes enabling the owners to go home and enjoy the remainer of their days." . . . "We must have from 90,000 to 100,000 square miles, which, with proper care, judicious handling, and better facilities for the transportation of food and utensils, will be the largest, as it is the richest gold field the world has ever known." . . . "That country offers to men of great fortitude and some intelligence and steadiness an opportunity to make more money in a given time than they possibly could make anywhere else."

7. THE SHORTEST AND BEST ROUTE TO THE KLONDYKE ALL THE YEAR ROUND.

The best route is undoubtedly that selected after careful inquiry on the spot by the agents of the Klondyke and Columbian Passenger Agency, viz., that known as the Dyea route over the Chilkoot pass to Lake Lindeman, thence down river by boat to Dawson City. The difficulties of transportation over the Pass which existed last year have now been removed by the construction by the Chilkoot Railroad and Transport Company of a railroad and aërial tramway. It formerly required from twenty to thirty days of toil and peril to deliver an outfit and provisions from Dyea to Lake Lindeman. This feat is now accomplished in twenty-four hours.

The Klondyke and Columbian Passenger Agency has made special preferential arrangements at high rates with the above-named Transport and Tramway Company for the carriage of freight over the Pass for the advantage of passengers booking by their through route from England. By this arrangement the journey is reduced by twenty-five days, and with the special traffic, dining, and sleeping arrangements made by the Agency with Steamship Companies and the Canadian Pacific Railway, the entire journey from Liverpool to Dawson City can be completed in about twenty-eight days.

The St. Michael and Yukon River route is 4,400 miles from the Pacific Coast as against 1,578 by the Dyea route, and no reliability can be placed upon it. The navigation of the Yukon is difficult and uncertain, the river boats being frequently stranded, and passengers delayed for months.

8. OUTFITS, PROVISIONS, PACKING, &c.

Much attention has been paid to these questions by the officials of the Agency on the Pacific Coast. It is only by practical experience that it is possible to secure the best and most suitable outfit for mining purposes, and to obtain the right class and quantity of supplies properly packed. The advantage to the intending Klondyker of expert advice as to the supply of outfit and provisions, and the best methods of packing, can hardly be over-estimated. The Klondyke and Columbian Passenger Agency supplies all the necessary experience.

There are numerous difficulties connected with the journey of which nothing is known in England. It is already impossible to secure passages on steamers to Dyea unless they are engaged some weeks ahead. Rates for baggage and passengers on the Coast are changing almost from hour to hour, so great is the demand.

On arrival at the Pacific Coast the voyager is ignorant of the best steamer on which to take his passage. In a strange country he is at the mercy of the first canvasser; in a strange town he is in the hands of the storekeeper, who undertakes to provide him with a miner's outfit for an exorbitant sum, omitting many of the most important and more expensive necessaries. He is pushed into buying provisions utterly inadequate and unsuitable for a year's sojourn in a gold-mining country. He is plagued by Customs officials, and, without experience and knowledge, is generally at the mercy of hacks all round.

All these difficulties, annoyances, loss of money and temper are smoothed away by the officials of the Klondyke & Columbian Passenger Agency. Not only do they provide first-class through transportation, including all meals en route by train, and sleeping accommodation, but have arranged so comprehensive an organisation in England, in New York, and on the Pacific Coast—Victoria, Vancouver, &c.—that a person going to the Klondyke under their guidance is provided with a miner's outfit complete in every detail, and of the best articles procurable; with provisions of the best quality sufficient to last for one year and with a boat on arrival at river navigation at Lake Lindeman, whence he may go down stream to Dawson City, either quickly or slowly at his leisure. Last, but not least, he is met on the arrival of the train at Vancouver by the official of the Agency on the Pacific Coast; taken to Victoria to receive his outfit and provisions, and is then personally conducted right through with his freight (a most important consideration) to Lake Lindeman.

He is relieved of all trouble and responsibility from the moment he leaves England.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company is formed to purchase and work the Pará Rubber Estates of the Visconde de S. Domingos, situated, as shown in the appended map, in the centre of the rubber district known as the "Islands," in the municipal District of Anajas, State of Pará, Brazil, and also for the purpose of carrying on the business of Rubber Curers, Shippers, &c. The Estates have yielded large revenues for a number of years, and are being sold owing to the advanced age of the Visconde.

AREA.—As will be seen by reference to the accompanying plan, the Estates comprise eleven different properties, all adjoining, with a total area of 737,572,035 square metres, equal to about 182,254 acres, or over 284 square miles, the whole forming one of the largest rubber properties in the valley of the Amazon and its tributaries. All the lands have been surveyed, and are free of rent and taxes. The title deeds have been examined by Mr. McDowell, Solicitor, of Pará, who reports that they are all in order.

VARIETY AND VALUES OF THE RUBBER.—The Rubber trees on the Estates comprise various species of Hevea (syn: Siphonia), producing Pará Rubber, the varieties of which are known by different names. The Rubber from the "Islands" district is termed "Islands," to distinguish it from "Up-river hard-cured," "Bolivian," &c. There are three qualities, viz., "Fine," quoted on the Liverpool market, March 18th, 1898, at 3s. 11d. to 3s. 11½d. per lb.; "Entrefine," 3s. 10d. per lb.; and "Negrohead," 2s. 7½d. to 3s. 1d. per lb. On these Estates "Entrefine" is seldom produced. For the value of Rubber produced on these properties, see Mr. A. Camille's report, dated London, March 28th, 1898.

DEMAND.—The demand for Indiarubber is best shown by the following figures, compiled from the Indiarubber Journal (February-March, 1897). Europe, together with the United States, in 1896 imported 100,804,238 lbs. of Indiarubber of all varieties, and of the total value of £10,395,436. Of this quantity nearly one-half, or 48,290,368 lbs., was imported into the United Kingdom.

Since 1894 the value of "Fine" PARA RUBBER, the "Islands" variety of which is produced on these Estates, has risen more than 25 per cent. The following table, compiled from the Indiarubber Journal, will show the steady increase in prices:

Year.	Lowest price.	Highest price.
1894	2/9½ per lb.	3/- per lb.
1895	3/0¼ per lb.	3/4½ per lb.
1896	3/0¾ per lb.	3/9 per lb.
1897	3/4 per lb.	3/9½ per lb.
1898	3/6 per lb.	4/- per lb.

REVENUE.—The Revenue derivable from these Estates is based on the results of actual production. The Company will acquire properties which are yielding very large profits, and have done so for a number of years.

An investigation of the books of the Visconde de S. Domingos has been made by Mr. E. Kanthack, of Pará (late manager to Messrs. R. Singlehurst & Co., of Pará and Liverpool), local auditor to the British Bank of South America and for many years acting British Consul, whose report is as follows:—

Pará, December 17th, 1897.

GENTLEMEN,—Having been appointed by Mr. Churchill, H.B.M. Consul, to examine the books of the Visconde de S. Domingos, with reference to his Rubber Estates, I beg to inform you that I have ascertained the production of Rubber on that portion of his Estates which has been worked during the last few years, and as this information seems to be particularly wanted in London, you may transmit by cable the following details:—

"Production, 1895, from 399 roads, worked by the Visconde's traders, 125 tons; by other tenants, 436 roads, estimated 137 tons. Total 262 tons. Last year, total 238 tons. Present year, estimated total, 251 tons. Coarse Rubber included, estimated 15 per cent.

"I remain, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
(Signed) "E. KANTHACK."

From the foregoing report it will be seen that taking the value of the "Fine" at an average price of 3s. 6d. per lb., and the "Negrohead" at 2s. 4d. per lb., and the proportions at 85 per cent. of "Fine" and 15 per cent. of "Negrohead" the gross value in London, from 835 Rubber Roads only, would be as under:—

1895.—262 tons	=	498,848 lbs. of "Fine," at 3s. 6d. per lb.	= £87,298
		88,032 ,, "Negrohead," at 2s. 4d. ,,	= 10,270
1896.—238 ,,	=	453,152 lbs. of "Fine," at 3s. 6d. per lb.	= 79,301
		79,968 ,, "Negrohead," at 2s. 4d. ,,	= 9,329
1897.—251 ,,	=	477,904 lbs. of "Fine," at 3s. 6d. per lb.	= 83,633
		84,336 ,, "Negrohead," at 2s. 4d. ,,	= 9,839
751 tons	=	1,682,240 lbs.	£279,670

Equal to an average gross value per annum of £93,223.

The Visconde's net profit in Pará, on the production of the roads worked by his own traders, has averaged 39 per cent. of the value there.

From figures supplied by Mr. E. Kanthack it is estimated that had the total production of the Estates during the last three years been shipped direct to London, the profit accruing from the sale, including the Rubber received for rents, and for goods supplied to collectors, would have amounted to a minimum of 50 per cent. of the above gross value, equivalent to an average annual net profit of £46,611, sufficient to pay 7 per cent. on the £175,000 Cumulative Preference Shares, and 15 per cent. on the £175,000 ordinary shares, leaving a balance of over £8,000 for administration and other expenses.

FUTURE REVENUES.—The results of the past three years were obtained from the working of an average of 835 Rubber Roads, being less than 28 per cent. of the Roads opened, and under 6½ per cent. of the estimated total number of full-grown trees.

The Revenues to be derived in the future from these Estates are entirely a question of Capital and Labour. It is proposed for the present to continue working the Estates on the Rental System, but under European supervision and control; to sell the Rubber in the best market for Gold; and during the coming season to work 1,600 roads (160,000 trees), reported by Mr. Kanthack to be practicable, and which should produce a net profit exceeding £90,000, which profit would be considerably increased by the further opening up of the Estates; and it should be noted that the average price of Fine Pará Rubber in the English market is now 3s. 11d. per lb., as compared with 3s. 6d. per lb., upon which price the above calculations are based.

WORKING CAPITAL.—The Working Capital, the subscription of which is guaranteed, will be £50,000. This will enable the Company to provide for the expenditure necessary to the increased business.

The statements in this Prospectus are based on Reports by Mr. E. Kanthack, Messrs. José Simoes Chuva and José Antonio de Rezende, jun., Mr. A. Camille, and Mr. F. Pond, and upon a letter from the Visconde de S. Domingos.

The Vendors have fixed the amount of the purchase consideration at £360,000, of which £120,000 is payable in cash, £100,000 in fully-paid Shares, and the balance in fully-paid Shares, or partly in Shares and partly in cash at the option of the Directors. The Vendors desire to have allotted to them the largest number of Shares permitted by the rules of the Stock Exchange relating to quotations.

The following Contracts have been entered into:—(1) Letter of Authority and Agreement dated the 26th July, 1897, by the Visconde de S. Domingos, in favour of Frederick Pond. (2) Letter of Authority and Agreement dated the 20th August, 1897, by Frederick Pond, in favour of William Brice. (3) An Agreement dated the 4th December, 1897, and made between William Brice, of the one part, and Ewen Cattanach, of the other part. (4) An Agreement dated the 6th day of December, 1897, and made between Ewen Cattanach, of the one part, and the Anglo-African Gold Properties, Limited, of the other part. (5) An Agreement (supplemental to the said Agreement dated 6th December, 1897) dated the 8th March, 1898, and made between Ewen Cattanach, of the one part, and the Anglo-African Gold Properties, Limited, of the other part. (6) An Agreement (supplemental to the said Agreement dated 4th December, 1897), dated the 14th day of March, 1898, and made between William Brice, of the one part, and Ewen Cattanach, of the other part. (7) An Agreement dated the 21st March, 1898, and made between the Anglo-African Gold Properties, Limited, of the one part, and William Roland Berkeley, as Trustee on behalf of this Company, of the other part. Copies of the above-mentioned Contracts, and of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, may be inspected by applicants for Shares at the Offices of the Solicitors for the Company.

The Anglo-African Gold Properties, Limited, who are the Vendors, are selling at a profit, and have undertaken to pay all the preliminary expenses of the formation, incorporation, and bringing out of this Company up to the first allotment of Shares. The guaranteeing of the necessary subscription, the advertising of this Prospectus, and such like matters, have entailed upon the Vendors certain Contracts which may technically fall within the 38th Section of the Companies Act, 1867. There are also, or may be, business Agreements or other Agreements which may technically fall within the said Section. To none of the Contracts mentioned in this Clause is this Company a party, and applicants for Shares must waive their rights (if any) under the Companies Acts or otherwise to the insertion herein of the names of the parties and dates of the same, or to disclosure of their contents. Applications for Shares will only be received on this understanding.

Messrs. Ewen Cattanach and Robert P. Heilgers, being interested in the sale, and Mr. R. O. Grischotti, being a Director of the Vendor Company, will join the Board after allotment.

Applications for shares should be made on the form accompanying the Prospectus, and be sent to the Company's Bankers, with the amount payable on application. If no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full, and where the number of shares allotted is less than the number applied for, the balance will be applied towards the payment on allotment.

It is intended to apply at an early date to the London Stock Exchange for a settlement and quotation of the shares of the Company.

Prospectuses, with Forms of Application for Shares, can be obtained at the offices of the Company, or from the Bankers, Brokers, and Solicitors of the Company.

London, March, 1898.

This Form when filled up should be forwarded with the deposit of 2s. 6d. per Share to the Company's Bankers, London & South Western Bank, Ltd., 168, 169, and 170, Fenchurch-street, E.C., or Branches.

On Allotment	47 „	(including 2 per cent. premium.)
On 4th May, 1898	50 „
	£102 „

The DEBENTURES will be registered in the Company's books, and be issued and transferable in sums of not less than £5, or multiples of £5. Interest will be payable quarterly on the 1st January, 1st April, 1st July, and the 1st October in each year. The first payment of Interest calculated from the dates of payment of the respective instalments will be made on the 1st July, 1898.

The Debentures are issued at £102 per £100, and are repayable by the Company at £105 per £100 on the 31st March, 1923, but the Company reserves the right to redeem the whole or any portion thereof prior to that date at £107 per £100, on giving six months' notice of its intention to do so.

If the Debentures become payable owing to the voluntary winding up of the Company, they will be redeemed at £105 per £100 Debenture.

The Debentures will be secured by a First Mortgage of the freehold land and houses and other permanent assets and a first and floating charge upon the undertaking of the Company.

By the terms of the Trust Deed to secure the Debentures the Company has the right to issue up to £250,000 Debentures beyond those now offered for subscription, but it is also provided that no further issue shall thereafter be made except for an amount equal to the cost price of additional assets acquired by the Company, and that no Debentures can be created to rank in priority to, or pari passu with, the above authorised issue of £1,000,000.

PROSPECTUS.

This issue of Debentures is made for the purpose of providing the Company with funds for completing a capital outlay of upwards of £400,000 in respect of the acquisition of freehold land at Broadheath, near Manchester, and the building and equipment thereon of the Company's new works and of workmen's cottages; the purchase of new plant; the acquisition of the Colonial and Continental Patents and business of the Linotype Composing Machine, and the provision of the further working capital required for supplying printers with various new Printing Machines and Appliances, for which important orders have already been received.

SECURITY.—The Debentures will be secured by a first mortgage on the freehold lands and houses and the other permanent assets and a floating charge on the whole of the undertaking, property, assets and effects of the Company, the value of which including patents and goodwill, and the above-mentioned properties, on the 31st December last, stood in the balance-sheet at £2,429,951 19s. 8d.

OBJECTS AND SCOPE OF THE COMPANY.—The business of the Company has hitherto consisted to a very large extent in the manufacture and sale of Linotype Composing Machines.

During the past year, the introduction of a large form of Linotype machine for Book and Pamphlet Work, Government Reports, &c., has extended enormously the field for the supply of the Company's machines.

The manufacture, under the Ballou Patents, of large movable type, known as "display type," used in advertising and ornamental printing, and of various machines and appliances used by printers, is also widening materially the scope of the Company's business.

PROFITS.—The net profits of the business from 1893 to the end of 1897, as appearing from the certified balance sheets of the Company, were as follows:—

Year 1893	...	£9,583
„ 1894	...	28,541
„ 1895	...	59,969
„ 1896	...	123,255
„ 1897	...	162,882 (including £21,984 premiums on new issue of share capital).

£10,000 is the amount required to pay the full year's interest on this issue of Debentures.

The Shares of the Company are quoted ex dividend on the London Stock Exchange, and stand at £5¾ per £5 Preferred Ordinary Share, and £7¾ per £5 Deferred Ordinary Share.

The dividends paid in respect of the year 1897 were 6 per cent. on the Preferred Ordinary and 9 per cent. on the Deferred Ordinary Shares.

CONDITIONS OF ISSUE.—If the whole of the Debentures applied for be not allotted, the amount paid on deposit, or such part thereof as will suffice, will be appropriated towards the sum due on allotment, and applicants to whom no allotment is made will receive back their deposits in full.

Failure to pay any instalment when due will render any previous payment liable to forfeiture.

Copies of the memorandum and articles of association, the report, balance sheet, and profit and loss account of the Company for the year ended 31st December, 1897, and the draft trust deed to secure the debentures, can be seen at the offices of the Company, No. 188, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Applications must be made on the form accompanying this prospectus, and delivered with the deposit to the Company's bankers, Messrs. Brown, Janson, & Co., 32, Abchurch-lane, London, E.C.

Appilcation will be made in due course for a quotation of the Debentnres on the London and Manchester Stock Exchanges.

Copies of this Prospectus and Forms of Application may be obtained at the Offices of the Company, or from their Bankers, Brokers, or Solicitors.

OUR PUZZLES

RULES.

1. The sum of £2. 2s. will be given every week for the best Epigram, Conundrum, Lipogram, Bouts-Rimés, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and, for obvious reasons, no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the Truth Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a Quarter to the same competitor.

7. All New Contributors are Required to Forward with their First Answers their Real Names and Addresses for Registration; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed 12, and must under no circumstances consist of more than 14, letters.

9. Competitors must on no account change their noms-de-plume they have once assumed.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed—

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 997.—COMPLETION OF A BROWNING STANZA.

Rosalys (real name and address will be published in due course) £2 2 0

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 993.

I have to apologise to those readers specially interested in this competition for the delay that has taken place in the announcement of the Prize-winner's name. The task of deciding on the winner has, in fact, proved to be one of unusual difficulty, and I have thought it best to seek expert advice in the matter. This compels me once more to postpone the publication of the result of this very interesting competition.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 996.

As previously stated, the result of this competition will be made known when Competition No. 999 is decided.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 998.

The Prize in this competition has been awarded to Lucia, who defined "Smart Society" to be "Pleasure's Treadmill."

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,002.

Much discussion has taken place of late as to which are the most effective Public Buildings in London. Such diversity of opinions evidently exists that it may be interesting to find out what is thought by Truth's readers on the subject. The usual Prize of Two Guineas is therefore offered this week to the competitor who sends in

A List of the Six Handsomest and most Effective Public Buildings in the Metropolis.

The six handsomest and most effective Public Buildings will be considered to be those which are found included most frequently in the lists received, and the competitor in whose list the names of most of these Buildings are found will be adjudged the prize winner. Only one list must be sent by each competitor, and all answers must reach me by the morning of Monday, April 18 next, at the latest.

Answers to Correspondents.

Fuss.—I shall have much pleasure in complying with your request in the circumstances you mention.

Fish.—Your name was omitted in error last week from the list of those who sent answers in connection with Competition No. 999.

W. W. B.—The objection seems to me somewhat irrelevant.

Mum.—Many thanks.

Alice R.—The arrival of your first answer cannot be traced.

Sponge.—I will make inquiries at once,

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

THE EXPANSION INTO SENTENCES, BY MEANS OF AN ADDED VOWEL, OF CERTAIN COMBINATIONS OF CONSONANTS, PUBLISHED IN "TRUTH" ON MARCH 17 LAST.

 Very many lists of sentences have been received in connection with this Competition. For the present, it must suffice to print a full list of the Completed Sentences as furnished by the Competitors who took part in Competition No. 996.—The Puzzle Editor.

1. Half mad and all aghast, a small, haggard, vagrant lad, a hard pagan, rag-clad Arab brat, tramps fast and far, past gas lamps, bank, and tall barracks, past asphalt paths and trams, starts at all placards as at black phantasms that alarm, past dark vacant barns, laggard farm hands, mail carts, and a caravan, and, as an astral balm charms branch and crag, halts at last at a damp, rank grass patch, grasps and abstracts an ash staff at hand, and, hazard past and man's tracks far back, falls aslant a canvas bag that ranks as knapsack, and hath at call all Canaan's fragrant land as grant, and lambs at grass as fat as rascals.—Dombey.

2. Two strong troops of Lord John Hood's corps, told off for pontoon work, go to-morrow on sloop Glow-worm from port of London to North Congo or to Sokoto.—Whig.

3. Never heed these creedless men;
See ye keep the tenets ten.
Feed the wretched, tend the meek,
Everywhere the helpless seek;
Tell them there's the endless rest,
Where they'll then be ever blest.
Union Jack.

ENTRE NOUS.

As my printers have a conscientious objection (which I respect, and share) to working on Easter Monday, it has been impossible to deal in this week's Truth with several important and interesting communications received during the last few days. All correspondence held over from this cause will receive attention in my next issue.

The Queen has no intention, as has been alleged, of "spending a day or two in Paris" on her way home. Her Majesty will travel direct from Nice to Cherbourg. The Queen is not expected to arrive at Windsor Castle from the Continent until the evening of Thursday, the 28th.

During the last fortnight the Queen has been seeing a great deal of Princess William of Baden, who is staying at Nice, and one of the papers refers to her as being the sister of the Emperor Frederick, which is a ridiculous blunder. The sister of the late Emperor is the Grand Duchess Louise of Baden, while Princess William is the widow of the Grand Duke's brother, her eldest son, Prince Max, being ultimate heir to the throne of Baden. Princess William is a daughter of the late Duke of Leuchtenberg, whose fortune was made by his marriage with the Grand Duchess Marie, eldest daughter of the Emperor Nicholas I., who fell in love with him at a review, and her father was obliged to consent to their marriage in order to prevent her from throwing herself into the Neva. The Duke of Leuchtenberg, who was said to be the handsomest man in the Russian Army, survived his marriage for less than ten years, dying at the age of thirty-five in 1852.

The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Denmark will come to England at the beginning of July on a visit to the Prince and Princess of Wales, and they are to stay in London for about three weeks.

The marriage of Prince Christian of Denmark, eldest son of the Crown Prince, and the Duchess Alexandrina of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, which is to take place at Cannes next week, will be attended by the Prince of Wales (and possibly by the Princess), the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Denmark, Prince and Princess Charles, the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland, the Duke and Duchess of West Gothland, the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Luxemburg, Prince and Princess Frederick of Schaumburg-Lippe, and several members of the Russian Imperial family.

The Prince of Wales will not be thoroughly settled at Marlborough House until after Ascot race-week, as H.R.H. has numerous provincial engagements before Whitsuntide, when he will go with the Princess to Sandringham for a fortnight. The Prince, who will return to London on Monday, the 25th, from the Continent, is to visit Newmarket for the First Spring Meeting from the 26th to the 29th, and he will be there again for the Second Spring Meeting from May 10 to 12. Then H.R.H. is to visit Lord and Lady Gerard at Garswood Park, Lancashire, on May 16, and afterwards he is going to Buckingham to inspect the Bucks Hussars in Stone Park on Friday, May 20.

About once a month somebody writes to ask me whether, on the succession of the Prince of Wales to the throne, the Duke of York will, ipso facto, succeed to his father's present title. It does not seem to be generally understood that a Prince of Wales, unlike a poet, is made —not born. Reference to history would show those who are in doubt on the subject that several Princes of Wales have had their title conferred upon them after their fathers have ascended the Throne, and in the ordinary course of things it is to be presumed that this precedent will be followed upon the next demise of the Crown.

Prince Christian will leave Cumberland Lodge next Monday for Dresden, where he is going to represent the Queen at the celebration of the seventieth birthday of the King of Saxony. Prince Christian is going to Dresden instead of the Duke of Connaught, who cannot conveniently leave England at present. Prince Christian is to spend a few days at Homburg during his stay in Germany, in order that he may see the Emperor and Empress, and also the Empress Frederick, who is now at Bonn, visiting Prince and Princess Frederick of Schaumburg-Lippe.

Princess Henry of Prussia and her children are to arrive at Windsor Castle about the middle of May on a visit to the Queen, and they will accompany her Majesty to Balmoral shortly before Whitsuntide. Princess Henry is to pass some time during the summer in the Isle of Wight, and she will reside at either Kent House or Osborne Cottage for several weeks.

In spite of reiterated protests, the monstrous annual outlay upon the Royal yachts shows no sign of decreasing. It appears that during the last twelve months the outlay for repairs and decorative work amounted to the extravagant sum of £17,681, of which money the Victoria and Albert absorbed £7,076, while £7,097 was laid out on the Osborne. The Alberta, which never now goes outside of the Solent, required £2,247; and the cost of the Elfin (the Queen's milk, newspaper, and stores' boat when the Court is at Osborne) was £1,261.

Lord and Lady Salisbury are expected to return to England on Tuesday, May 3, from the Riviera, and they will reside principally at Hatfield House during the summer. I hear that Lord Salisbury is going to resign the office of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, as he is so seldom able to visit Walmer Castle, and it is said that he will be succeeded by Lord George Hamilton, who will thus be provided with a pleasant and highly salubrious country residence.

Sir Blundell Maple has the sensible pride of a successful man in himself, and does not seek, like some rich fools, to pass as the descendant of a silly Crusader, or of a ruffian who lived in a castle during the Middle Ages and robbed his neighbours. Some gentlemen were discussing "old families" before him, and one of them suggested to him that his name showed that he is descended from the minstrel who discovered Richard Cœur-de-Lion in his prison. "But how about Maple?" said Sir Blundell. "Nothing more simple," replied the other. "When Richard heard him singing outside the castle, he said, 'Blondel m'appelle.' The minstrel repeated this to his friends so often that he got called 'Blondel m'appelle,' which has been corrupted into Blundell Maple."

At the latest Council meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society, Sir Nigel Kingscote announced that, as the result of last year's working, the total assets of the Society have increased from £45,875 to £48,572. This year's Show will be held at Four Oaks Park, near Birmingham, from June 18 to 24, being the week after Ascot.

Only about a year has elapsed since the death of the Duc d'Aumale, but the collections at Chantilly will be opened to the public on two days in each week, on and after the 15th. One would vastly like to know when the Hertford collections, which were left to the country by Lady Wallace, are likely to be accessible. I am told that the galleries will not be open for another year at least, which probably means two years in reality. Hertford House is certainly not going to be a cheap possession to the country, for £105,000 has already been voted for "necessary alterations," and there is an item of close upon £6,000 for "expenses of management," which is nearly as much as it takes to maintain the National Gallery.

The friends of Mr. Clement Scott—who are many—must all have been glad to see that he has made his peace with the ladies of the dramatic profession. If his historic pronouncement upon stage virtue had been true, it would still have been one of those things which are better left unsaid, and which the speaker generally wishes he had not said as soon as he has uttered them. Not being strictly in accordance with facts (as even the most virtuous now admit) there could be no excuse at all for saying it. The moral which I find in the story is that persons who have not cultivated the art of employing speech to conceal thought should never open their doors to an interviewer. Mr. Clement Scott and Mr. W. S. Gilbert—although, as I was grieved to learn at the late trial, they are not at one upon all points—have combined, within the space of a few days, to furnish the public with striking practical illustrations of this truth.

It is one of the paradoxes of journalism that no papers exhibit greater laxity in publishing baneful and objectionable advertisements than those which are run on strictly religious and temperance lines. The Scottish Reformer, the official organ of the temperance party in Scotland, is a conspicuous instance of this. It inserts advertisements which are not only immoral, but fraudulent. Their immorality is patent to the most unsophisticated reader, and their fraudulency has been proved over and over again, the last occasion being in an action in the law courts, to which I referred on March 17. How any respectable journal can allow its columns to be used by this peculiarly vicious class of medical quacks is simply incomprehensible.

At a time when money is urgently needed everywhere for educational purposes, it does seem to be in the highest degree foolish and ridiculous to waste large sums upon absolutely useless foundations, of which there are several at every University in the country. At Edinburgh there is a Chair of Celtic Language and Literature which has an endowment of £514 a year. During the present session the lectures have been attended by one student only! Then there is the Watson Gordon Chair of Fine Arts, with an income of £468, and two students! It may truly be said of some University Professors that their yoke is easy and their burden is light, while their fodder is extravagantly generous.

Lord Crawford has been elected President of the Bibliographical Society, which is an excellent choice. Lord Crawford was reluctantly obliged to sell the greater part of his magnificent library at Haigh Hall, but he has since formed another, which contains a large number of rare books. Mr. A. H. Huth, who is the new Vice-President, is the possessor of his late father's famous library, which has been valued at over a quarter of a million.

Much indignation is being expressed at Cambridge about a report that the erection of the Sedgwick Memorial Museum is again to be postponed on some pretext or other. More than twenty-five years have elapsed since Sedgwick's death, while the necessary funds for the proposed building were raised long ago, so the innumerable delays which have taken place have caused profound dissatisfaction. The whole affair reflects the utmost discredit on the University, and it is really to be hoped that the Senate will interfere decisively, and prevent any further delay, for which there can be no reason whatever of any sort or force.

No fewer than seven Anglican dioceses in various parts of the world are now vacant, and some of them have been left unoccupied for so unprecedentedly long a period that many of the "Church people" in the country must have come to think that, having got on very well without a Bishop for such a considerable time, they might now dispense altogether with such a functionary. Five of these dioceses are to be filled up by the Archbishop of Canterbury whenever he can find leisure to attend to such matters. The Sees of Bombay (£2,500 a year, with residence) and Calcutta (£3,000 a year, with residence) are in the gift of Lord George Hamilton, in his official capacity as Secretary of State for India.

It seems that the rumour which credited the Archbishop of Canterbury with the intention of conferring a Lambeth degree upon the Mayor of Nottingham was well founded. At a meeting of the Town Council last week, the Town Clerk announced that upon the recommendation of the Bishop of Southwell the Archbishop had conferred upon their Mayor the degree of LL.D. It is true that the Mayor is a lawyer by profession, but there is no pretence that the degree is given in recognition of his legal learning or acumen, it being avowedly a mere mark of the gratitude of the Church for the Mayor's services at the Church Congress. This proceeding is a gross abuse of the Archbishop's power of conferring degrees, and suggests that steps ought speedily to be taken to deprive him of power to confer bogus academic distinctions.

By way of demonstrating the waste of ecclesiastical revenues in small parishes with microscopic populations, a gentleman has been good enough to work out for me some statistics of such benefices, taking the incomes from the Clergy List, and the populations from the last census returns. The result is highly interesting. Taking only the letters "A" and "B" in the Clergy List, under the former head are to be found ten incumbents with an aggregate income of £1,294, and an aggregate population of 679 persons, inhabiting 154 houses; while under letter "B" are to be found eighteen parsons with an aggregate income of £2,998, a population of 1,227, and 251 houses. Putting the two tables together, we have an income of £4,392 assigned to twenty-eight clergymen for the cure of 1,906 souls, or an average of £157, fourteen and a half houses, and sixty-eight people to each parson.

Here are a few of the more striking individual cases:—

Houses in Parish.	Population.	Value of Living.
7	40	£120 (and house)
8	42	£185
8	44	£110
8	50	£170 (and house)
11	48	£120 (and house)
12	59	£130 (and house)
14	57	£230 (and house)
15	63	£275 (and house)
15	85	£170 (and house)
18	98	£200 (and house)
20	94	£200 (and house)

No doubt similar results would be found under every initial letter in the Clergy List if it were systematically gone through.

Now it will be seen at a glance that the whole of the twenty-eight parishes referred to above, with their aggregate income of £4,392 per annum, do not contain among them as large a population as many a populous town parish. It would be easy indeed to find in all parts of the country single parishes with populations three or four times as great as the whole of these twenty-eight put together. It is really a monstrous and indefensible proceeding that the Church of England should be appealing to the public for money to support its clergy, while the revenues it possesses are squandered in this reckless and senseless fashion. Neither religion nor business justifies the appointment of a resident parson with a house and income of anything from £100 to £300 a year to a hamlet consisting of a score of houses or less and a population of less than one hundred people.

Sir William Lockhart's glowing and undiscriminating eulogies on every officer and man engaged in the Tirah Expedition, together with his portentous list of individuals selected for special mention, read like a sort of official counterblast to the criticism which the many blunders of the campaign have provoked in military circles both in India and at home. If by such means it is hoped to throw dust in the eyes of the public, and to gloss over the shortcomings of Indian military organisation, that expectation is likely to be disappointed. The voluminous correspondence that I have received from India by the last two mails affords pretty clear proof that, so far as that country, at any rate, is concerned, opinion on the mismanagement of the campaign has been in no way modified by the submission of the Afridis.

The criticism which the Staff has incurred in connection with the recent operations, has evoked many comments upon the systematic violations of the rules limiting an officer's period of Staff service. The regulation which requires a man to go back to regimental work after two years' Staff employ is undoubtedly sound in principle, and tends quite as much to keep up the efficiency of Staff officers as to promote a wider distribution of Staff billets. But in practice the rule is systematically ignored both in England as well as in India. There are several officers in high places at Simla at present who have done no regimental duty for fifteen years or longer, and it stands to reason that such men must be utterly out of touch with regimental feeling, while their knowledge of the details of regimental work must have grown very rusty. At the same time it is disheartening to officers who have taken the trouble to acquire the P.S.C. to wait year after year without finding Staff employment.

There are no fewer than seven officers, nominally squadron commanders in one Indian Cavalry regiment, at present enjoying billets on the Staff or under the Foreign Office. Two of these have actually not seen their regiment since the last Afghan War. A third was on the Commander-in-Chief's Staff uninterruptedly from 1883 to 1895. He was then appointed Brigade-Major of one of the Brigades of the Chitral Relief Force, and remains in that or some similar berth down to the present moment. It really looks as if some officers were formally granted exemption from all Service rules and regulations, just as in former days Kings and other favoured individuals received indulgences from the Church enabling them to commit with impunity what, in humbler mortals, were counted deadly sins.

Another point on which I have received a good deal of correspondence is the rearguard engagement in which the 1st Northamptonshire were involved on November 9 at Saran Sar. A great deal has been said about this affair, and it may be remembered that a long letter from a soldier in the 1st Northamptonshire was published in Truth of February 10. Colonel Chaytor has, I understand, now been removed from the command of the battalion, presumably as the result of the inquiry that took place into this affair.

Now, in discussing the details of the engagement in Truth of February 10, I said that it was obvious even to a civilian that somebody had blundered, and that the blunder had resulted in a deplorable loss of life. At the same time, let us be sure that we get the blame on the right shoulders. The hill at Saran Sar was occupied by the 4th Brigade on the early morning of November 9. As mentioned in my correspondent's account of the fighting, "the retirement was ordered to commence at 12.30, but was delayed on account of some of the headquarter staff being late; consequently, it did not commence until about 2.30 p.m." The result of this delay was that the troops were overtaken by darkness before they reached camp. Colonel Chaytor took his men through a nullah, where the enemy attacked the rear company, and some desperate fighting took place, one section under a colour-sergeant getting astray, and being killed to a man.

Clearly, the primary cause of this disaster was the delay of two hours in the retirement of the brigade. Whose fault was this? The story universally current in India, and alluded to by the soldier from whose letter I have just quoted, is that the delay arose entirely from Sir William Lockhart and his Staff stopping at the foot of the hill to lunch. If this is true, clearly Colonel Chaytor was not the chief party to blame for the disaster to his battalion. The chief fault that he committed appears to have been taking his men through a nullah, but a mistake of this kind is neither criminal nor inexcusable in a Colonel and a regiment fresh from Madras, and quite inexperienced in mountain warfare. My readers will remember what has been said with regard to the repeated attacks on convoys on the Arhanga Pass, in consequence of their being allowed to be on the move after dark, a blunder which was only rectified after the disastrous attack which resulted in the loss of the treasure chest, 12,000 or 13,000 rounds of Lee-Metford ammunition, and a number of mules. When it is remembered that no one has been punished for this deplorable bungling, it is not surprising that there should be a strong feeling in India that Colonel Chaytor has been most harshly dealt with.

Another interesting fact on which one of my Indian correspondents comments is that, while the C.O. of the 1st Northamptonshire is thus sacrificed, a General Officer commanding a brigade on a different part of the frontier, who undoubtedly by his faulty dispositions and arrangements brought about quite as serious a disaster, has been advanced to the command of a district.

A great deal has been said about the important part that parlour games and amateur theatricals play in the distribution of high commands and snug billets in India. Perhaps the most extraordinary example of this sort of thing that has occurred is the recent appointment to a certain District Command in the Punjab. The General commanding this district having gone on active service, the post should, in the ordinary course of things, have been filled by the next senior officer. There were at least three officers on the station perfectly qualified to undertake the duty. It so happened, however, that an honorary officer of the Simla Amateur Dramatic Club was then out of military employment, and he was at once recognised as the proper man for the post, and duly appointed. There could hardly have been any other reason than his dramatic talents for the selection, seeing that the officer in question was on half pay, was only in Simla on leave from England, was not on the Indian Establishment, had no claim whatever on the Indian taxpayer, and had never commanded more than a company of infantry during the course of his military career. I hear that since this appointment was announced several well-known amateur actors with military qualifications have gone to India in the hope of securing profitable employment.

For years past we have heard of the grievance of the Indian Staff Corps through its officers being placed under men junior to themselves in the British Service who happen to be serving on the same station. This grievance has been remedied, but apparently only with the result of putting the boot on the other leg, for I now have a communication from India, in which an officer's wife complains that in the Poona command at present several Staff Corps Officers junior to her husband are taking seniority over him, owing to their having the temporary rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. This is not a sentimental grievance, for the British officer concerned was passed over for appointment to an important post in the Tirah Expedition, owing to one of these temporary Lieutenant-Colonels coming before him. Surely it might have been possible to do justice to Peter in this matter without robbing Paul.

It is true that our expenditure on the Army is going up at the rate of millions per annum, but it may be some comfort to taxpayers to know that if there is a chance of saving sixpence, our military administrators are not likely to overlook it. In proof of this I may refer to a circular letter recently issued from the War Office "with reference to the charges for cab hire by officers on change of stations," &c. The circular points out that "experience has shown that, as a general rule," the 120 lb. of luggage which an officer is allowed free by passenger train "does not divide into more than three packages that go outside a cab." Consequently "the charge for outside luggage should not exceed sixpence (calculated at the rate of twopence per package)." It would be interesting to know how much time, labour, and money have been spent at the War Office in tabulating experience on this important point, working out statistics, and issuing the necessary instructions.

I do not know whether officers are called upon to produce the cabman's receipt as a voucher for the expenditure of sixpence under the foregoing circumstances, but it appears to be the practice to require such receipts where an officer has to incur cab hire in the performance of his duties. I heard an amusing story told the other day by a man who had to obtain a receipt for this purpose from an illiterate Irish carman. After drawing up the document in his note-book, the officer had to get the carman to affix his cross to it, and then sign it himself as a witness to the carman's signature. Really, considering the quantity of financial camels which the War Office requires us to digest every year, I think a few gnats like these might be swallowed without so much straining.

The Government of India is also cultivating the virtue of economy in this matter of cab fares. I have before me a letter addressed from Fort William on January 1, 1898, with reference to certain claims for garry hire made by a medical officer at Aden in respect of duty during the period from February to September, 1896. It has apparently taken the Government about sixteen months to adjudicate upon this point, and when their decision comes, it is to the effect that a Surgeon-Captain of the Medical Staff who has had in the course of his duties to journey constantly between Steamer Point and the Crater, Aden, which I understand is a distance of about ten miles, going and coming, is not entitled to any allowance for a vehicle.

This matter is argued out at some length by the Government, and seems to be influenced not so much by a feeling that a medical officer ought to walk ten miles in a tropical climate as a matter of course in the performance of his duties, as by a fear that, if the concession is made to this particular officer, it will have to be extended to others. This view of the matter is fortified by the following singular argument :—

> Every officer, as a rule, keeps a pony or a horse for his own convenience, and, as the pay he receives from Government enables him to do this, it is quite fair that he should occasionally use his animal to assist him in the performance of his duties.

I do not know what the Army will say to this view, but it obviously implies that the Government has a sort of claim upon the whole of every officer's goods and chattels. If his pony, why not his stables and groom? And if these, why not his house and furniture, the clothes on his back, and everything purchased out of his pay?

According to a statement which appeared in the Press a few days before Easter, the War Office is still appealing to the civilian medical profession for help out of its present difficulties, and as many as six official posts which ought to be filled by Army Medical Officers are now said to have been given to civilians. Why do not the authorities avail themselves of the services of the many Medical Officers, retired on gratuities, with liability to further service, who are only too anxious to return to duty? Why are these officers liable to further service—and thereby greatly handicapped in civil practice—if they are not to be used in emergencies like the present?

It may interest the War Office authorities to know that I have authentic evidence in my possession showing that the sergeant-major of a certain battery of Royal Horse Artillery in India has, for a long time past, made it a practice to levy on the canteen sergeant for the time being a payment of Rs. 4 per barrel of beer sold. In addition he has, in some cases, retained for his own use the payment of Rs. 7 8 a. per month allowed to the canteen sergeant. In one recent case the sergeant refused to pay the money, but the sergeant-major contrived to make things so unpleasant for him that he eventually gave in to the extent of agreeing to pay Rs. 2 per barrel. The understanding, of course, is that these payments are to be recouped by watering the beer and selling short measure, so that virtually it is an arrangement for defrauding the soldiers for the benefit of the Sergeant-Major. It would be idle to mention the name of the battery, for, of course, the sergeants still in the battery, who have been parties to these irregularities, would decline to admit their share in the transaction. The facts are, however, vouched for by men who have left the Service, and I think that if the military authorities were to go to work in the right way they could soon verify the allegations for themselves. It is much to be desired that such frauds should be detected and stopped.

My attention has been called to a misprint in a paragraph in Truth of February 17, dealing with a recent promotion to the rank of Commissary-General in the Madras Command (Burma). It was there suggested that the grievance of the Commissariat officers on the Madras list, in being deprived of a promotion to which they were entitled under the Army Circular of 1889, should be met by transferring to the Bengal list "Lieutenant-Colonel Kelly, senior Commissary-General, First Class, on the Madras list, who is already officiating as Administrative Commissariat Officer in Burma, and by filling up the vacancy thus created from the Madras list." The officer alluded to was Lieutenant-Colonel Kenny, not Lieutenant-Colonel Kelly. I take this opportunity of saying again that the Indian authorities ought not to lose sight of this point, for as matters stand at present they have been guilty of a direct breach of faith towards the officers of the Madras list.

If a list of the candidates for the post of Commandant at the Staff College could be published, it would probably furnish some interesting and suggestive reading. From what I can learn, there must have been several who, to the ignorant eye of a mere civilian, appear much better qualified for such a post than the officer on whom the choice of the War Office fell. That is to say, while the officer selected can have only a theoretical knowledge of soldiering, there were other candidates who have commanded regiments on active service, and gained war distinctions, and whose educational qualifications were quite as well attested as those of Colonel Miles. Primâ facie there is good ground for the remark made by an officer who writes to me on this subject, that "the men who get on in the Army are those who sit at home in comfortable billets, under the eye of the Pall Mall authorities, who do not spend too much time in grinding at the regimental mill, and who do not incur the toils and perils of active service in out-of-the-way parts of the world."

A noble lord holding the Queen's commission the other day raised a protest in Parliament against the outrageous expenditure forced upon him by needless changes of uniform. Lord Lansdowne had, of course, a soft official answer ready, which purported to prove that whatever changes have been made have been rather for the benefit of officers than otherwise. That is a view which I doubt whether the Service generally will endorse. The following letter recently reached me on the subject, and it comes from on officer who is specially qualified to know what has been going on recently in regard to changes of uniform:—

> It was the custom up to the last two years to blame the Duke of Cambridge for every change in the dress of the Army, and it was therefore thought that when Lord Wolseley was appointed officers would be spared the expense entailed by needless alterations. The reverse has been the case, and it is not too much to say that during the last two years there has been more transmogrification of uniform than during the whole thirty-eight years of the Duke's Commander-in-Chiefship. There is hardly an article of dress and equipment that has not been experimented upon, and, as a rule, with the worst results. Whatever our Army may have been in other respects, it was formerly at least well dressed. Now all this is changed, and our officers and men in their slovenly sack-like "frocks," and their field caps, which are something between a Glengarry and a fool's cap, present a spectacle which is certainly not likely to induce recruits to join the Army.
> Officers, too, are complaining loudly of the endless expense they are put to in order to satisfy the caprices of individuals at Headquarters, and to fill the pockets of tailors. The whole dress of the Staff has been changed, and Artillery Colonels have now to throw away their blue tunics and clothe themselves in scarlet for no conceivable reason but pure love of change. . . .

On the other hand, when there is an opening for a sensible dress reform, it seems to pass unnoticed. I have once or twice ventilated the grievance of a cavalry officer who complains of having to sit on a court-martial in knee-boots, jack-spurs, haversack, whistle, and "head-dress unplumed." I now hear from this officer that the authorities have so far yielded to the suggestions of common sense as to strike the "head-dress unplumed" out of the regulations. One would have thought that while they were about it they would have gone a little further; but I suppose the exalted individual who interests himself in these matters likes to protract as long as possible the pleasure of issuing new sumptuary regulations, and is therefore reluctant to issue one order where he can carry the thing out by half a dozen. For his guidance when he next gives his attention to this important subject, I may mention that my cavalry friend suggests that a suitable dress for a court-martial would be "service frock, overalls, Wellington boots and spurs, sword, and belt." My friend thinks that he could try a prisoner much better is this dress, and anything which will conduce to the interests of justice always has my support.

Several Volunteer officers have written in corroboration of the experience of the late C.O. of the 4th Lancashire Volunteer Artillery, dealt with in TRUTH of the 31st ultimo. No doubt if the last week or two had not been the busiest time of the year for Volunteer officers, I should have heard more on the same subject, for I am told on all sides that there is hardly a Volunteer corps which cannot furnish some illustration of the systematic efforts of the War Office to force officers to finance their corps out of their own pockets. I take the following from a letter written by one Commanding Officer:—

The thanks of the Volunteer Force are due to you for your article on "The War Office and the Volunteers," more especially as you hit the nail so straight on the head.

The case of the 4th L.V.A. is simply one example out of many of the present system of War Office management, and it well illustrates the usual methods of the Department.

From an experience of over thirty years in the Volunteer Force, latterly as a Commanding Officer, I have not the least doubt that the War Office has no intention of organising the Volunteers or of doing more for them than can possibly be helped. This is simply due, as you say, to "professional jealousy and selfishness." Not the least effort is made to make use of the splendid material of which the Force is composed; but on the contrary no device of which red tape is capable is spared to thwart the efforts of men who are doing their best to help in the defence of their country.

I am sorry that so little has been said on this point during the discussion on the increased and increasing military Estimates. The public, I do not doubt, are willing to agree to any necessary expenditure to ensure the safety of the country, but it is no use giving more money to be wasted by the present ring of officials. We of the Volunteer Force know that the amount which is necessary for our efficiency would not be grudged if we give good value for the money, and that we can do, and are ready to do, when the War Office will let us.

It is a great pity that the public do not show more interest in this important question. At this time of year, when the Volunteers have been disporting themselves in their Easter manœuvres, one reads in the Press a vast amount of more or less unintelligent gush over their self-devotion and public spirit, and their admirable bearing and physique. But the British Public generally would feel very uncomfortable if they had nothing but the Volunteers behind the Fleet as our second line of defence, and it is an astonishing thing that they should consent, year after year, to vote money for the Force, without making the slightest attempt to secure that value is given for the money. No one appreciates the Volunteers more highly than I do, but I appreciate them more for what they might be than for what they are; and they will never be what they might be until Parliament insists that the War Office shall take the Force in hand and organise it as an effective unit in our national defences.

The Punjab Government is being appealed to, I understand, for a pension for the widow of Mr. L. F. Maclean, superintending engineer at Delhi, whose sad death was noticed in these columns last week. Mrs. Maclean is not, it seems, legally entitled to a pension. Seeing, however, that her husband, a distinguished public officer, lost his life, as the Lieutenant-Governor has declared, partly through the mistake of a Government Civil Surgeon in writing out a prescription, and partly through the disregard of rules by two other servants of the Government in making up the prescription, a pension ought surely to be granted in so exceptional a case. On the principle qui facit per alium facit per se, the Government is directly responsible for the death of the lady's husband.

The Lieutenant-Governor of Burma has just given his decision on a case which affords a good illustration of the contempt in which the liberty of the subject is held by Indian officialdom. Some months back the authorities at Rangoon got into a state of unreasoning panic in view of an intended demand for the delivery up to Government of a piece of land on which a Mohammedan sect called Chittagonians had erected a plank hut, alleged to be a mosque. The event proved that the fears of a riot were groundless, neither the Chittagonians nor the Mohammedans in general exhibiting any resentment at the handing over of the building. But the police in their terror thought they must do something, and what they did was to arrest a well-known and respectable native merchant who is a Memon, and who had no concern with or influence over the Chittagonians. A man of his nationality was, in fact, about as likely to stir up a riot on account of a ramshackle Chillagonian mosque as a High Church parson would be to excite himself about the demolition of a Plymouth Brethren's meeting house.

The merchant in question was arrested on a warrant, signed by Mr. H. L. Tilly, District Magistrate, requiring him to show cause why he should not be bound over to keep the peace. By the day following the arrest it was found that a mistake had been made, and the magistrate made an order to the effect that "there was not now any necessity to call upon Ahmed Moolla Darwood to show cause," &c., and that "he might go." Before "going," however, the prisoner desired the magistrate to inquire into the truth of the information upon which the warrant had been issued. By Section 117 of the Criminal Procedure Code it was clearly the duty of the magistrate to try this question, but he declined to do so, nor would he disclose the names of the parties upon whose information the arrest was decided upon. The prisoner memorialised the Lieutenant-Governor for an inquiry into the circumstances of his arrest and release, but the reply is simply that the magistrate "believed" the information on which he acted, and that nothing further can be done. So long, therefore, as Mr. H. L. Tilly, or any other credulous magistrate, "believes" any cock and bull story that is brought to him, no matter how absurd it may be, it is sufficient to justify an arrest, and the prisoner may be subsequently dismissed without either an attempt to substantiate the charge against him, an admission that it is unfounded, or a disclosure of the names of his accusers. No subject, whatever his nationality, is safe on these terms.

A few months back it was suggested in TRUTH that discharged soldiers applying to the Dublin branch of the Army and Navy Pensioners' Employment Society sometimes have cause for dissatisfaction at the treatment they receive there. A further complaint on the subject has recently come to hand, and this time it is alleged that Protestants or Freemasons have a better chance than others of getting work through this office. Whether the office is managed by Protestants or Freemasons, I cannot say; but it would cut the ground from under many complaints, and be more satisfactory all round, if there were some sort of committee to look after the work of the branch and hear complaints from disappointed applicants.

A discharged quartermaster-sergeant R.A., applying the other day for employment at the Edinburgh office of the same Association, was shown the telegram reproduced below from the Postmaster at Glasgow to the secretary of the office. Temporary employment at 11s. 9d. to 17s. per week, or permanent employment at 15s. with no prospect of promotion for several years, is a captivating sort of offer to make to a non-commissioned officer discharged with an exemplary character after thirteen years' service. I much fear that, if the duty of finding employment for ex-soldiers is left to any great extent to the "model employer" of St. Martin's-le-Grand, the result will not do much to stimulate recruiting or enhance "the advantages of the Army." This is the Glasgow Postmaster's offer:—

Ten of the twenty men asked for are wanted as relieving postmen at sub-offices, at wages varying from 11s. 9d. to 17s., according to the duties performed. These are wanted for temporary employment only. A few more—three or four probably—are still needed as assistant postmen here, wages 15s. In their case the employment would probably be permanent. No promotion, however, for several years would be at all likely, owing to the large number in this class.

Here are some facts showing that it is not without good reason that the Telephone Department of the Post Office is so severely criticised. For about twelve years an estate agent in the West End has rented from the Post Office a private wire between his two places of business. On March 4 he wrote to the Secretary stating that one of his offices would be transferred on the 25th to a house three doors farther up the same street, and asking that the private telephone should be removed and fixed in the new premises by that date. The receipt of the letter was acknowledged on the 7th, and about a week later an engineer came to ascertain what was required. As nothing more was done, further letters were addressed to the Department on the 23rd and 25th, saying that the office had been removed and the telephone instrument left at the old premises, where it remained at the risk of the Post Office. The instrument was fetched away on the 26th; and on the 30th a formal acknowledgment of the letters of the 23rd and the 25th arrived. But though yet another reminder was sent to the Department, no step has been taken—or, at any rate, had not been a few days back—to carry the private wire to the new office, great inconvenience being caused by the consequent severance of communication with the other office. Comment upon such dilatoriness and mismanagement seems almost superfluous. The way in which this small job has been dealt with is a pretty good proof, however, of the futility of relying upon the Post Office for a proper development of the competition with the National Telephone Company which, as Mr. Hanbury admits, is so urgently required.

THE APOTHEOSIS OF THE PENNY.

The hot water lamp-post, which also supplies packets of tea, cocoa, &c., on the penny-in-the-slot system, is already gaining considerable popularity in London.—Morning Paper.

So far, so good! But when these lamps
  Are well-known points in London scenery,
What, then, is it proposed to do
  With penny-in-the-slot machinery?
When from a lamp-post we can make
  Hot streams of tea and cocoa well up,
In what direction next, we'd ask,
  Will automatic modes develop?

Will penny-in-the-slot machines
  Supply not only teas, but dinners?
And give out automatic "tips"
  To those intent on backing winners?
Will licensed lamp-posts be allowed
  To take the place of public-houses,
And offer passers-by a chance
  Of strictly limited carouses?

And, may we venture to believe,
  That even now the time quite close is
When similar contrivances
  Will deal out drugs in penny doses?
Dispensing for this trivial fee—
  Without the need of an appointment—
Such remedies for common ills
  As powders, capsules, pills, and ointment.

Will automatic music, too,
  Be, so to speak, "on tap" to cheer us?
Shall we have pennyworths of Brahms,
  And Gounod, and Mascagni near us?
And will there (this we ask, we own,
  With grimmest of anticipations)
Be penny-in-the slot machines
  Charged to the brim with recitations?

In short, 'mongst that which soon to us
  A century new will be allotting,
Shall we acclaim an age of U-niversal Penny-in-the Slotting?
An age when all our daily wants,
  Whether they be but few or many,
Will be sufficiently supplied
  By merely dropping in a penny?

Some highly "Progressive" patron of the drama on the County Council brought forward the other day a proposal to render it compulsory on managers of theatres and music-halls to open their doors so as to prevent a waiting crowd outside. In spite, however, of the moving picture he drew of the sufferings of the early birds, an unsympathetic meeting declined to entertain the subject, and the enthusiastic playgoer will still have to display his hardihood when he elects to plant himself in front of a door some hours before the advertised time of its opening. It may, perhaps, have occurred to the more practical members of the Council that there is a necessity for some "close time" in which to prepare a theatre for its next audience, and also that if a "waiting crowd" could legally compel a manager to open his doors, the close time would speedily disappear altogether.

The Holbeach Guardians have vanquished the Local Government Board in the famous culinary controversy, and the inmates of the Workhouse will still continue to revel in suet-puddings with three ounces of suet to the pound! How the poor foreigner must envy the fortunate inhabitants of a country which can afford to keep up a Department with a President at £2,000 a year, and an adequate staff, to check wanton extravagance in the shape of too much suet in its paupers' puddings! And how the same P.F. will thrill at mention of those Holbeach Hampdens who refused to stand by and see their paupers quietly dispoiled of their rightful heritage—of suet!

Considering what London suffers at the hands of gas and water companies, it is astonishing that even a vestry should have the audacity in these days to betray the interests of the ratepayers into the hands of another gang of monopolists. The vestries of Hackney and Fulham propose to do this by disposing of their provisional electric lighting orders to companies, and if these reactionary schemes are carried through, each parish will suffer a loss of many thousands a year. In the case of Hackney my contemporary London makes some grave allegations of bribery; and in both cases the transaction contemplated is undoubtedly most fatuous and shortsighted, in view of the results of the working of electric lighting enterprises by other local bodies in the metropolis and municipal corporations throughout the country.

The large army of cyclists will rejoice over the recent police notice issued against the reprehensible practice of throwing broken glass haphazard into the streets, as well as nails extracted from packing cases, &c. Not that the Commissioner appears to have been moved into action by the woes of the wheelman, so much as by the serious injuries resulting to the feet of horses from contact with these obnoxious articles. There is unquestionably a strong tendency on the part of the less responsible inhabitants of London to make use of the roadways for the disposal of anything and everything required to be got rid of, and if this practice can be checked by the issue of the notice in question, it is a pity that it has not been made public before. But the caution against strewing the pavement with orange-peel, circulated by the police, is anything but universally regarded, and it is to be feared that a like fate is in store for the present warning.

A correspondent takes exception to a remark in Truth the other day that the Home Secretary could effectively protect the Chief Constable of Devonport from the Watch Committee, if that arrogant body fell foul of him for instituting licensing prosecutions on his own responsibility. I am reminded that a Watch Committee can dismiss a Chief Constable at their pleasure, and that the only appeal against their decision is to the Town Council out of which the Committee is formed. This is perfectly true, but nevertheless it seems to me that the Home Secretary could interfere effectively enough, if he considered that an injustice was being done. He could not absolutely prevent the dismissal, but he could, unless I am greatly mistaken, withdraw the grant of one half of the cost of the police—including one half of the Chief Constable's salary—which is made from the national exchequer to every city and borough. A mere intimation that this would be done would suffice, I fancy, to bring the most pig-headed and tyrannical Watch Committee to their senses.

At the same time, I agree with my correspondent that the position in which a Chief Constable stands is far from satisfactory. In the larger towns he is, as a rule, allowed ample freedom in the discharge of his duties; but in many of the smaller boroughs he is hampered and harassed at every turn. In more than one place besides Devonport it is the practice of the Watch Committee to determine in secret conclave whether prosecutions shall be instituted or not against persons who have been reported by the police for licensing or other offences—in other words, to try in private the question whether a case shall be tried in public. These Star Chamber inquiries almost invariably lead to scandals such as have occurred in Devonport, through the failure to prosecute persons who ought to have been prosecuted, and who would have been prosecuted if the matter had been left with the Chief Constable.

In every town the Chief Constable must, at times, tread upon the corns of influential people—it may be even upon the corns of members of the Watch Committee—and if he is to do his duty in such cases without fear or favour, he should be secured against arbitrary dismissal. I think, myself, as I have explained, that the Home Secretary already possesses the means of shielding him from the wrath of the Watch Committee. But it would certainly be much better that an officer who occupies such a responsible position, and who is really as much the servant of the State as of the Municipality, should be given a definite right of appeal from the Watch Committee to the Home Secretary in case of dismissal.

It is one of the blots on the Local Government Act of 1894 that it failed—thanks to Tory obstruction and opposition—to place the administration of parochial charities on a definite and satisfactory footing. Here is a case that has arisen. A Parish Council appoints two trustees of a parochial charity. The Charity Commissioners appoint the other trustees, and the latter refuse to allow the Council to inspect the trust deeds of the charity. Is the Council entitled to make such an inspection; and, if so, what steps should be taken to obtain it? Perhaps some of my legal readers may be willing to answer these queries.

The principle of noblesse oblige evidently does not commend itself to the Dacre Hamiltons of County Monaghan. In July last, Mr. Dacre M. Hamilton, a Lieutenant in the Militia, and a son of Mr. Dacre M. A. Hamilton, an extensive landowner in the county, was riding a bicycle on the footpath, when he knocked down and severely hurt a poor old woman named Mary Smith. The old woman, who works hard for her livelihood, asked for compensation, and the Dacre Hamiltons proffered her the munificent sum of five shillings. She took her claim to the Monaghan Quarter Sessions, and last October Judge Craig gave a decree in her favour against Lieutenant Hamilton for £10 and costs. Hamilton Senior then made another offer of £3. This being refused, nothing whatever was paid under the decree, and a few days since the Judge's attention was called to the defendant's default.

It appears that Lieutenant Hamilton is a minor. He is, as the judge put it, "old enough to serve her Majesty in the Militia, yet young enough to set the law at defiance" by refusing to pay this debt. The judge was indignant at the refusal, and he proceeded to express his opinion of the Dacre Hamiltons, father and son, with remarkable frankness:—

> "I thought it impossible," said his Honour, "that a gentleman—an officer in the Militia, and the son of a grand juror and extensive landowner in Monaghan, should behave in such a manner. I often hear that the country is changed, and I say it is changed when conduct of this kind is persisted in by men like the defendant and his father. . . . . There was a time when, if a Militia officer behaved in this manner and refused to compensate this poor old woman, he would have been obliged by the public opinion of his regiment and his fellow officers to resign his commission. I don't know whether Militia officers of the present day entertain the views that were formerly held."

I hope we shall see that they do.

If a new argument was needed—which it was not—against the practice of kissing the cover of a dirty Testament in order to lend additional credibility to evidence in Courts of Justice, that argument has now been supplied. We knew before that the custom is stupid, profane, dirty, and dangerous to health. We know now from the letter of Mr. F. A. Stringer to the Times, that it is, comparatively speaking, a new-fangled absurdity, without even the sanction of historical tradition to give it respectability. Mr. Stringer, who has been investigating the subject, declares that, down to the end of the seventeenth century, the witness merely laid his hand on the Bible in swearing, and that no mention of kissing the Book can be found before the middle of the eighteenth century. That ought to settle the matter.

It would be interesting if Mr. Stringer would find out for us next who introduced the practice of kissing the volume, and why. As the custom does not exist in any other country, it could hardly have been imported, yet one would think there must have been some reason for starting such a strange practice. If kissing had to be done at all, I wonder that our forefathers did not start kissing the usher or the judge, both of whom wash their faces occasionally, whereas the Court Testament goes uncleaned from beginning to end of its existence. True, I have seen an usher wipe the book with his pocket-handkerchief before handing it to a witness, but, though well meant, this attention is not as comforting as might be wished. And it was only offered to a Duke—not to an ordinary witness.

In fairness to the authorities of the Supreme Court Pay Office, one more word is necessary in reference to the case of the lady and the legacy recently noticed in TRUTH. It seems that the idea that the money could not be obtained, notwithstanding the order of the Court, until the next dividend became due, arose from a misunderstanding on the part of the solicitors to the legatee. As soon as attention was called to the matter, the Assistant Paymaster-General promptly removed this misunderstanding, and the young lady has now come into her modest inheritance of £50 and interest which the Court of Chancery had kept during her minority. The fact that she was compelled to employ a lawyer, and to incur costs to the tune of £7 15s. 6d. in getting the legacy, still remains, however, a serious reflection upon the procedure of the Court of Chancery in such cases.

Apropos of the question of Chancery costs, a lawyer points out that an immense amount of money is squandered every year through the mere folly of testators. As a case in point, a testator left the interest of £300 to a certain woman for life, and afterwards "to be equally divided among the lawfully-begotten children and grandchildren of my late sister Jane." The £300 was paid into Court in an administration suit, and the Chief Clerk certified that it was payable to thirty-five persons on the death of the life tenant, i.e., seven children and twenty-eight grandchildren of the late sister Jane, the parties being scattered all over the world. The shares amount to less than £9 each, and in all probability many of them will never be taken out of Chancery on account of the expense involved to the parties entitled. No doubt a considerable portion of the accumulations of unclaimed property in Chancery is due to similar dispositions.

The Lord Chancellor has added another job to his long list. Judge Edge, of the Devonshire County Court circuit, has been appointed to the vacancy at Clerkenwell, caused by the retirement of Judge Meadows White. The Devonshire vacancy has been given to Mr. Robert Woodfall, who was born in 1855, and called to the Bar in 1883, and was a member of the South Wales circuit, the Chancellor's old circuit. It can scarcely be said that he is a well-known junior. But he is a good Tory, and a brother-in-law of the Lord High Jobber, whose second wife is Mr. Woodfall's sister. Considering the importance which now attaches to County Court jurisdiction, it is scandalous that such appointments should be given in this manner. It has been supposed that every one connected with Lord Halsbury by blood or marriage had at last been provided for at the public expense; and the discovery that the list is not yet exhausted will be an unpleasant discovery for the British taxpayer. By the way, I may mention that the new Judge is not the author of Woodfall's "Landlord and Tenant." The original edition was published in 1802, and since 1830 the work has been brought up to date by many writers, none of whom bears the name of Woodfall.

The following is an interesting story of County Court procedure. On October 18, 1897, a servant girl, who had been unable to obtain her wages on leaving a situation in the West End, took out a summons in the Marylebone County Court for the recovery of the amount due to her, which included, in addition to wages, 5s. 6d. money lent to her late employer. The late master and mistress were apparently people of some means, living in a house probably not rented under £80 a year. On November 23 the case came on for hearing, there was no defence, and an order was made for payment on December 7. On December 7 the employer had not paid, and a further order was made that he should pay on January 31 or be committed. On January 31 the employer had still not paid, and again an order was made that he should pay in ten days, or a warrant should be issued. By this time the unfortunate girl had paid 8s. 6d. in court fees, absolutely without any result. On February 10 the girl called at the Court to see what had been done, and was told that unless the defendant paid by Saturday, the 12th, he would be arrested on Monday, the 14th, and that she need not call again. A friend, however, who was looking after her case, told her to go to the Court again, which she did on the 15th. She was then told that the defendant had not been arrested, and that if she wanted it done she must pay another 3s. This she did.

Nothing more happened until the first week in April, when the plaintiff was informed that the money had been been paid into Court, and would be handed over to her on Friday, the 8th. It seems that a warrant was actually issued on February 15, and has never been executed, although the defendant has frequently been seen about during the interval. I respectfully commend this case to the notice of the learned judge of the Marylebone County Court. What is the use of a Court for the recovery of small debts which orders a man of substantial means to pay a sum of £1 12s. on December 7; which, on his making default, simply orders him to pay on January 31; which, on his defaulting again, declines to do anything further, unless the creditor is disposed to pay 3s. for his arrest; and which, having extorted this 3s., simply leaves the defendant to pay at his own convenience? The whole thing is a mockery from beginning to end, and a travesty of justice.

A note should be made at the Education Department of a case at Redditch Petty Sessions last week, in which Miss Harrison, head mistress of the infants' school, Bentley, was convicted of assaulting a little girl five years of age. The child had been mercilessly thrashed with a blackthorn stick, and the lower part of her body was a perfect mass of bruises, some of them six or eight inches long. In letting the defendant off with a fine of 10s. and £2 19s. costs, the Bench doubtless assumed that she will have to pay the further penalty of dismissal from her situation. It should be the business of the authorities at Whitehall to see that she is dismissed from this situation, and that she does not obtain another of the same kind; for a woman capable of such savagery towards a child of five is utterly unfitted for employment as a schoolmistress or teacher.

Mr. Tonman Mosley, Chairman of the Derbyshire Quarter Sessions, must think no small beer of himself. Sir Henry Hawkins, when recently on circuit at Derby, expressed his strong disapproval of what appeared to him—and his judgment on such a matter can be implicitly accepted as sound—to be a cruel and unnecessary prosecution for bigamy. This displeased Mr. Tonman Mosley, and last week he gave vent to his displeasure in a long lecture to Sir Henry on the administration of the law against bigamy. At one point in his discourse the worthy Mosley had the grace to confess that it might be "somewhat presumptuous" in him to criticise and censure "a most learned, expert, and experienced judge." It was indeed.

It will be seen from my Legal Pillory this week that the Somerset County J.P.'s are still conspicuous for the exceptional severity with which they treat would-be suicides. Judges of Assize and Chairmen of Quarter Sessions in other counties generally recognise the futility and the cruelty of inflicting sentences of imprisonment in such cases, and the culprits are usually handed over to the care of their friends or of some philanthropic agency. These Somerset Shallows seem, however, to think that persons in the state of mind which leads to attempts at suicide are most likely to be reconciled to life by an experience of the rigours of a gaol, and an unhappy creature like the girl Stickland is accordingly given a longer sentence than a vicious brute like the man Gray. The only other case in the following list to which I would call special attention is the sentence upon a man and woman at Edinburgh, who were induced by their poverty to act upon the popular, but erroneous, dictum that "findings" are "keepings." Considering what the Sheriff himself said as to the character of the prisoners, and the temptation to which they were exposed, the "ends of justice" would surely have been met by a very much lighter punishment:—

Batley Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. J. B. Jubb, W. Critchley, and W. Bagshaw. Gerald Black, convicted of having been drunk and riotous, and assaulted two policemen. It was stated that defendant acted like a madman, and kicked both officers on the legs and body. Fined 2s. 6d. and costs for each offence.

Batley Borough Police-court. Before the same magistrates. Joseph Ackroyd, charged with lodging in the open air, and having no visible means of subsistence. He was found asleep on a door step in the street. Ten days.

Somerset Quarter Sessions. Before Sir R. H. Paget and other justices. Wm. Gray Randall Gray, convicted of unlawfully assaulting Laura Trent. One month.

Somerset Quarter Sessions. Before Sir R. H. Paget and other justices. Ethel Amelia Stickland, aged 18, charged with attempting to commit suicide. Three months.

Grantham Borough Police-court. Before Dr. Shipman and Mr. S. L. Williamson. Lot Goodson, charged with assaulting his wife. He kicked her and threatened to murder her, and he often thrashed her. Bound over to keep the peace.

Grimsby Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor (Mr. J. Sutcliffe), Messrs. W. B. Louth, C. Morton, E. Bannister, and A. Connell. Herbert Hutchinson and Wm. Eggleton, two youths, charged with stealing firewood value 1s. 6d Hutchinson fourteen days; Eggleton twenty days.

Tunbridge Wells Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. F. W. Elers, R. Pelton, G. Cheverton, H. Pink, and G. Langridge. Fred Jenner charged with cruelty to a horse. The animal was found lying on its back in a ditch. It was in a most emaciated condition, and had evidently suffered fearfully from want of food and exposure, which eventually caused its death. The Bench said it was a very gross case of cruel neglect. Fined £2 10s. and £2 13s. costs.

Eckington Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. F. Swallow, H. A. Fowler, and R. Eyre. Four men named Bellamy, Smith, Platts, and Atkin, charged under the Poaching Prevention Act with being found in possession of game. Bellamy fined £3, the others £5 each.

Airdrie Sheriff Court. Before Hon. Sheriff Adamson. Alexander Pope pleaded guilty to assaulting Edward Quin by striking him repeatedly on the head and face with a glass bottle, cutting his left temple and jaw; also to assaulting Mary Quin, by striking her on the head with the bottle, knocking her to the ground and kicking her. Fined £2.

Ipswich Police-court. Before Messrs. G. F. Josselyn, J. May, R. M. Miller, S. R. Anness, and R. D. Fraser. Ernest Walford, charged with stealing twopennyworth of coal from the quay. Ten days.

Stourport Police-court. Wm. Upton, charged with sleeping out. Seven days.

Sheffield City Police-court. Before Messrs. Frank Mappin and R. Colver. Tom Lilley, charged with cruelty to a horse. The animal having fallen down, defendant struck it with a chain so brutally that the marks of the chain links were deeply imprinted on its loins. Fined 15s.

Halifax Police-court. Matthew Dickinson, charged with assaulting his wife. He struck her and kicked her, and then put her out of the house, threatening that if she went back he would cut her throat. Bound over to keep the peace.

Gloucester County Police-court. William Badham, convicted of assaulting William Webb. Defendant struck complainant across the head with a stick rendering him insensible. Fined 10s. and costs.

Sleaford Police-court. Before Mr. H. Smith, Lieutenant J. S. Reeve and Mr. G. W. Lloyd. William Price, charged with sleeping out and having no visible means of subsistence. Seven days.

Birkenhead County Police-court. Before Messrs. F. R. Lee, S. Eddowes, and John Elliot. John Wm. Goodier, charged with stealing a pair of boots. He had hitherto borne an excellent character. Twenty-one days.

West Riding Quarter Sessions, Wakefield. Before Mr. G. B. C. Yarborough. Henry Cannon pleaded guilty to stealing a shirt. Six months.

Edinburgh Sheriff Court. Before Sheriff Rutherford. John Foinhand and his wife pleaded guilty to a charge of having appropriated a sum of £65 in notes which their child had found in the street. The man watched the newspapers for several days for an advertisement from the owner of the notes. No advertisement appeared, and the family being in extreme poverty, one of the notes was cashed. The Sheriff said there was nothing previously against the prisoners, and they had had a great temptation. The ends of justice would be met by a sentence of two months' imprisonment each.

A monstrous example of Justices' justice came to light at the Surrey Quarter Sessions last week, when one Johnson, a labourer, was indicted for stealing spent bullets from a rifle range at Aldershot. Johnson's explanation was that he did not know he was doing wrong by picking up the bullets, and the jury acquitted him. Unfortunately, however, the verdict could not wipe out the fact that, before he was brought to trial, this man had already undergone three months' imprisonment—a punishment which would have been outrageously excessive even if he had been found guilty of the offence. I regret that the newspaper reports omit to name the magistrates who committed him to the Sessions without bail on such a trumpery charge. The names of such woodenheads could not be too widely advertised.

The latest hiding-place of the Spanish prisoner's fabulous treasure—in this instance a little sum of 650,000 fr. in French bank notes—is a remote spot in the Himalayas. He has addressed one of his familiar communications to a tea planter in that part of the world, and the planter has sent it on to me. The profound faith of these buried, treasure swindlers in the gullibility of mankind was never better shown than in the story of the prisoner's journey to the Himalayas to conceal the money. Another striking proof of it is the fact that many of the letters issued by the gangs who work the swindle from Barcelona and Valencia are actually lithographed. But their faith, profound as it is, is well-known to be justified by the results, so thickly is the world populated with fools.

At the beginning of the winter John James Jones issued one of his plaintive appeals, accompanied by a letter from his auditors, Messrs. Beddow & Son, dated November 3, Subscriptions greatly needed by The Royal Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.—6,929 convictions this year; 7,320 last year. Address complaints of cruelty, contributions, letters, &c., to Secretary, 105, Jermyn-st., London.

showing John James' need of increased pecuniary assistance. In a further circular, dated March 17, this same appeal is enclosed, and the party addressed is requested to kindly read it. Are we to take it that the first appeal has produced no result, and that the financial position of the London Samaritan Society remains the same on March 17 as it was on November 3? Unless that is so, John James has clearly no business to be still circulating this letter as an authentic statement of the financial position of his concern.

Poor Monsieur Solomiac's four cases of "Grand Cru La Générale, année 1888," are still on hand, and are now being hawked about among British Consuls in various parts of Europe. The last of his letters that I have seen is dated March 31, and it tells precisely the same story about the death of the beau-père, the dispute with the beau-frère, and the necessity of making an inventory of the estate at once that was, first offered to the British public at the beginning of November last. This leads me to suspect that Monsieur Solomiac's statements cannot be implicitly relied upon; but judging from the pertinacity with which he repeats his tale, it is good enough for many of our countrymen.

Under the title of the "Society for the Promotion of Home Industry," some party at 21, Sarsfeld-road, Balham, is playing the old game of coaxing registration fees from the credulous. The "society" touts by circular, pleading that it "does not care to have resource to ordinary advertisement, for the simple reason that so many bogus so-called home employment agencies daily use the medium of the press to induce people to part with their money, with, to say the least, a very shady prospect of any paying result." People who are inveigled by this twaddle into payment of 1s. 6d., receive a circular offering 9d. per dozen for crochet-work doyleys of which a sample is enclosed. The only condition laid down is that Arden's Crochet Cotton No 24 is to be used. Now the retail price of this cotton is 2d. per ball, and one ball will make only three doyleys. Hence the cost of the cotton, plus a penny for postage, swallows up the whole of the 9d. paid by the "Society" for the finished article. Thus, for the privilege of doing work for nothing, and for a sample value ¾d., the unfortunate dupe finds herself mulcted in the sum of 1s. 6d. There are a good many of these home employment gentry who would be the better for a little occupation of the same remunerative character that they provide for others—say six months' oakum-picking.

The advertisement for the sale of "the magnificent upright iron grand piano, with check action, full trichord, and seven octaves, in a lovely walnut-wood case, with marquetrie inlayings," to which I have frequently referred of late has assumed a new form. Evidently the lady who is compelled to sacrifice the instrument in order to join her husband in India has ceased to be attractive. The gentleman whose serious losses in business for years past have led him to sacrifice an enormous number of "magnificent upright grands," apparently no longer exists. Yet it cannot be due to the fact that the stock of these shoddy musical boxes is exhausted, for now an "Electrician, going to China," is willing to part with his cherished fifty-six guinea instrument for nineteen guineas. The explanation is simple. The electrician merely succeeds the distressed gentleman and the grass widow as another and newer alias of Mr. Reginald Grattan, of 35, Erlanger-road, S.E., and the new address, 191, Queen's-road, Peckham, is only a newspaper shop at which letters are received. This intimation will be a sufficient hint, I trust, to the managers of the Daily Telegraph, the Daily Mail, and such other newspapers who assist this man's designs by publishing his misleading advertisements.

The fortune-tellers of this country are not in it with their contemporaries in the Far East, as may be seen by the following postcard advertisement just sent home from India. You could not get anything like this amount of information at the same price in Bond-street:—

I cannot help being struck by the fact that, having recently commented upon the manner in which certain newspaper competitions are conducted, I am now being overwhelmed from all parts of the country with letters complaining of the management of this or that venture of a similar class. My contemporaries who go in for this sort of thing know their own business best; but, judging from the evidence at present to hand, I should think that these competitions must make quite as many enemies as friends. In many instances this is not to be wondered at, for the trick is really a little too thin. One of the favourite forms of competition is the picture-puzzle, in which the meaning has to be interpreted in a series of little sketches illustrating some stated subject. A competition of this kind runs for several weeks, and the usual plan seems to be to set for several weeks in succession pictures which any fool can interpret at a glance, and then in the last week or two to floor the majority of competitors with one or two hopeless enigmas. In this way thousands of deluded idiots are led to go on buying the paper week after week, and, in the end, only one or two appear in the running for a prize, which very likely is not awarded at all.

There is another little dodge, recently perpetrated in a weekly which shall be nameless, and very common among all such publications. Instead of the answers to the puzzles being announced when the competition closes, an interval of several weeks elapses before it is declared. Now it very frequently happens that some of the puzzles are obviously capable of more than one interpretation, so that nothing is easier than for the puzzle editor to ultimately fix upon the solution which has been arrived at by the smallest number of competitors. I do not say that this was done in the case above alluded to, but the fact of the announcement being delayed for three or four weeks naturally suggests this conclusion to competitors who have given a solution which is apparently correct, but find that it is not the one intended.

Another difficulty in regard to these competitions is that nothing is easier than for some of the staff of the newspaper running them to secure a prize for themselves or their friends by more or less indirect means. There must be a special danger of this in the case of a number of publications issued at one office in which a numerous staff is employed, and where, consequently, the proprietors can have very little control over the details of the competition. I may be of an unduly suspicious disposition, but I cannot help thinking that there has been some trick of this kind in the case of one or two of the competitions that have been brought specially under my notice. The whole question is one which, I think, deserves more attention than it has hitherto received from the proprietors of journals running such competitions.

Considering the humanitarian spirit of the age, I wonder that no one has ever protested vigorously against the cramming of live poultry by forcible means. If common-sense were combined with humanitarianism, this practice would seem to be worthy of attention before vivisection, for vivisection is excused—rightly or wrongly—by the desire to serve humanity; whereas the poultry-feeder who uses a machine to cram his wretched birds to the bursting point before sending them to market, tortures them solely for the purpose of increasing the profit which each bird yields him during its brief life.

I have often been tempted to protest against this detestable barbarity, but have been restrained by a feeling that I should be raising my voice in the wilderness. But having had a letter on the subject from an officer in the Army, who seems to share my views, I begin to hope that there may be others of the same way of thinking. Army men are not, as a rule, unduly sentimental. My military ally calls attention specially to an advertisement in the Field of a "patent cramming machine," illustrated by a tasty picture of an unfortunate fowl undergoing the process—the operator holding the creature under his arm with a tube in its mouth, and forcing the food into it by working a treadle with his foot. If he had to answer the question, the Editor of the Field would probably not deny that this machine is an instrument of torture, and torture of the most unjustifiable kind. I wish he would set a good example by stopping the advertisement, and raising his voice against the practice. By the way, what view does the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals hold on this point?

Criticism is always welcome. I therefore publish with pleasure the following postcard:—

> Dear Truth,—Your poetry on page 847 contains a novelty, namely, to pole-axe pigs; and on the page 850 you mention, re the Revenue, "the shorn lamb shivering in the March wind." Where do these phenomenal lambs, that can be shorn in March already, exist? An Admirer of "Truth."

My dear Teutonic admirer (I detect your nationality in your last sentence), you can undoubtedly pole-axe pigs in poetry. If you possess a poet's licence you can kill the animals in any manner that your metre requires, and I really think that there is more poetry about pole-axing than about the ordinary process. As for the shorn lamb, lambs may be found with wool upon them in March in many parts of England (and, I believe, in Germany also), and if a lamb has wool on him he can be shorn—"in March already."

They legislate with greater expedition in some of our Crown Colonies than we do. Last month, a Bill was submitted to the Legislative Council of Ceylon. Its object was to impose an export duty on arrack. Nothing had been known precisely of the intention to bring in the Bill. It was not even on the agenda paper. It was introduced, passed through the first, second, and third readings, and made law by the Governor by the words, "I give my consent to an Ordinance for imposing an export duty on arrack," in the course of three minutes. The Bill may have its merits, but the Ceylon Press complain that such a proceeding in a British Colony may well be regarded with "indignant wonder."

In connection with the Ceylon Legislative Council, I am told that a recent appointment to that body has occasioned much dissatisfaction among the Tamil community. It appears that the Tamils have hitherto always had a representative among the non-official members of the Council, but the term of office of their last representative, Mr. P. Coomaraswamy, lately expired, and the Governor hurriedly filled up the vacancy by the appointment of Dr. Rockwood, who retired for the purpose from the Medical Department, and who had no previous municipal or other experience to qualify him for a seat on a legislative body. The Singalese and Mahommedan members were re-appointed for another term, and the idea prevails that the Tamil member has been displaced in consequence of the independent line he took in regard to certain official proposals. The non-official element in the Council might as well be abolished altogether, however, if opposition to the official majority is to be deemed a disqualification for membership.

While the Ceylon Government exercises, as I showed last week, a strict supervision over the proceedings of the District Judges and magistrates, it allows the subordinate officers and employees of the courts to do pretty much as they please. So at least I gather from the experiences narrated by a correspondent, who was lately involved in a civil suit in a district in the southern part of the island. Several of the minor officials of the court were ready to place their services at his disposal in various capacities, clerical and otherwise, and he found that it was a common thing for them to be engaged on private work for litigants. Such a system must obviously lead to abuses, and the Governor would be better employed in putting an end to it instead of interfering so improperly with the discretion of the judges and magistrates.

The last mail from Trinidad brings the news that the sugar planters have this year applied to the Legislative Council for 2,276 East Indian immigrants. This is very interesting in view of the fact that one of the grounds put forward by the West Indian planters and their friends for demanding our aid in maintaining the sugar industry is that, if we do not grant it, we shall have to send back at our cost all the coolies that have been brought from the East Indies. The coolies have been imported simply because the planters would not pay the native black population a fair price for their labour. It would now seem that, in order to force our hands, coolies are to be procured in increasing numbers, for the present application is for 576 more than were obtained last year.

The number last year was 1,700, and it was only by a deliberate violation of the law with regard to coolie immigration—a violation sanctioned by Mr. Chamberlain—that that number could be imported. It is provided by an ordinance of 1870 that no immigrants shall be allotted to any estate on which 15 per cent. of the indentured coolies have received a wage of less than sixpence a day during the previous year. Had this law been observed in 1897 only 168 coolies could have been legally brought into the colony during that year; but the ordinance was set aside for the benefit of the sugar planters then, and now it is to be set aside again.

Nor is this all. For some time past greater severity has been observable in the treatment of the coolies, and in Trinidad, according to the local paper, Reform, it has become the custom to imprison without the option of a fine every indentured immigrant who leaves his employer's estate without a pass. In many of these cases a pass is applied for, but refused, simply in order to prevent the coolie from going to the Immigration Office, as he has a right to do, to lay a complaint before the Protector of Immigrants. A coolie must, therefore, either endure any grievance under which he suffers, or else run the risk of being arrested and imprisoned when he goes to seek redress. There is plenty of evidence, in fact, that the indentured coolie system is rapidly developing into a system of slavery. Now that they have got Mr. Chamberlain on their side, the sugar planters apparently imagine that they can do as they like.

To be in the fashion is everything—particularly with a woman. We are now in a martial mood, so far as words go. Therefore, lovely woman must tune her lyre in a martial key. Take the following from "Songs of Love and Empire," a collection of verses by Mrs. Hubert Bland, which has just been published. Thus does this gifted poetess invoke war:—

> Oh, if the gods would send us a balm for our sick, sad years,
> Let them send us a sight of the scarlet, and the sound of the guns in our ears;
> For valour, and faith, and honour—these grow where the red flower grows,
> And the leaves for the nation's healing must spring from the blood of her foes.

I can conscientiously recommend the "Songs of Love and Empire" to all music-hall patriots. There is more of patriotism than poetry in them, but I am sure that they have only to be known widely for a movement to be started for a statue to the poetess on Westminster Bridge, as a companion to Boadicea in her chariot drawn by wild horses.

Mr. McKinley seems to be doing for the United States very much what Lord Salisbury is doing for England—consulting the best interests of his country, and pursuing his own policy without regard to the advice of newspaper editors and the howling of fanatical Jingoes. It is evident that he would avert war, if he could do so without sacrificing the honour of the country and running counter to the deep-seated national sentiments in favour of the efforts of the Cubans to shake off the Spanish yoke. There is, however, a Jingo spirit in Spain as well as in America, and I question whether the Spaniards will make it possible for the United States to keep the peace.

I have been amused to read in one of the most ardent of our Jingo newspapers a denunciation of what goes in America by the name of the Yellow Press. What the Jingo Press is in England the Yellow Press is in America. It preaches war, and when there is any chance of America being involved in one, it publishes telegrams, some purely imaginative, some a mixture of fact and fiction, with comments thereon designed to show that the country is being disgraced and degraded by the pusillanimous inactivity of its Government. This is precisely what occurs here. One journal seeks to outbid the others by a patriotism which consists of hysterical vapourings and blatant swagger. For our journalists to complain of American journalists in the same line is much like the yellow sunflower bullying the primrose for its yellowness.

The Savoy Hotel have made a special engagement with the celebrated Boldi, who, with his orchestra, has been creating such a sensation in Paris, to play at the Savoy Hotel during the dinner and supper for ten days, beginning on Saturday next, April 16th. Monsieur Boldi's Paris engagements prevent his staying longer than this. He played recently before Her Majesty the Queen at Nice by special command.

Look at the past two or three years. We were first ordered by the London Yellow Press to go to war with the United States about the ownership of some swamps in Venezuela, the very existence of which is already forgotten. We were to support Mr. Rhodes in his effort to create a revolution in the Transvaal, in order to enable him and other millionaires to keep up the price of the shares of gold companies in that Republic. Only the other day we were to fight France about the exact line of frontier between what we claim and what France claims in West Africa. As for Manchuria and China, we have been ordered by these Press patriots to do something new every day in order to defend our honour and our interests.

And yet who are these Bobadils of journalism? A newspaper is becoming more of a business undertaking every day, and every day the business has, owing to competition, to be carried on at a higher pressure of sensationalism. The owner or the editor of a newspaper is generally a man who, like most others, wants to make money. He is no more entitled to speak for the country than any one else. His opinions are of no more value than those of any other citizen. This, I am happy to think, is pretty fully recognised at present. The London Press has no influence outside London, and very little influence in it. People buy newspapers in London to read the news of the day on current matters. They distrust all that is tinged with politics and that comes from abroad, and pay very scant attention to the patriotic outpourings with which the news is accompanied.

The only scrap of comfort that the patriotic editors have left to them is to announce in the contents-bills that we have, with heroic courage, slain thousands of Dervishes by mowing them down with Maxim guns. That we must, in the long run, overcome the resistance of the Arabs—whom Mr. Gladstone has described as brave men struggling to be free—is certain; but, whether this be necessary or the reverse, I see little cause to boast of our being victors in so one-sided a contest.

A curious uncertainty exists as to the way we ought to pronounce the name of our latest leasehold, interest in the Far East. Some assert it should be called "Wy-ha-wy," others say it is "Way-hi-way," whilst I believe there is a third party in favour of "Wee-ha-wee." If the author of the following verses may be believed, there is some difference of opinion, even amongst the members of the Cabinet, as to what "W-e-i-h-a-i-w-e-i" really spells:—

ECHOES FROM A RECENT CABINET COUNCIL.

"'Tis high time that we did something,"
Joseph to his colleagues said.
"Have you seen this morning's Standard
And the last Times leader read?
We must take a bold step forward,
And of China grab a piece;
Here"—and on the map he pointed—
"Why not get of this a lease?
Wei-hai-wei would mask Port Arthur,
We that place must occupy"——
From a colleague came the question,
Like an echo,
"Why-ay-why?"

"Why?" exclaimed the pushful Joseph,
"Why? I am surprised at you.
Why? Because the Times is furious,
And the Post and Standard, too.
Shall the Bear checkmate the Lion?
That is what I want to know.
In the name of Trade and Commerce
We must strike an instant blow.
There must be no hesitation,
Not another hour's delay!"——
Said a colleague, "Are you sure, though,
That you see your Way-oh-way?"

"If you're wise," the voice continued,
"You'll not join the Jingo chaunt;
Wei-hi-wei, I give you warning,
Is a mere white elephant.
No one in this room has seen it,
Nor can knowledge of it claim;
None of you can say for certain
How he should pronounce its name.
'Why-ah-why' or 'Way-hi-way,' now?
Which it is you do not know.
Have a care, then, lest time shows you
Its true name is
'Woe-oh-woe!'"

SCRUTATOR.

COMMON-SENSE AND CHINAMANIA.

MANY Englishmen have been living in a world of illusions, which have been, to a very considerable extent, caused by the silly boastful trash that is daily published by the amateur "patriots" of the Jingo Press. We have hugged to our hearts of hearts three illusions: (1) that we have been granted by a divine decree the special right to annex all countries inhabited by black and yellow men; (2) that, if we have a navy of exceptional strength, we may act on this divine decree without any regard to those who question it; (3) that we may dictate the law to the world, and yet never find ourselves involved in a serious war, all other Great Powers being so convinced of our might, that to hear us is to obey us.

In the Far East, our naval supremacy had for long made us absolute masters. We have held the sea-way to these parts, and there was no other way. All this is changed. Russia has civilised Siberia, and she has welded together the terra firma of Europe and Asia. China is consequently at the mercy of the Russian legions, and we can no more hinder this than Russia with her legions can invade England. This alteration in the position of the two countries towards China is by no means pleasing to us. Our Jingoes can hardly realise it, so angry are they at it. Their anger at the logic of facts leads them to curse our Government for not having hindered it, although what the Government could have done to hinder it, or what it can now do to alter it, they do not themselves know. The usual recipe of building more ships is of no avail.

The first outcome of the situation has been that Russia has insisted upon obtaining a naval fortress and a commercial port in Manchuria. Lord Salisbury recognised that it was only reasonable that the Trans-Siberian railroad should have as a terminus a port free from ice. In the debate last week Mr. Curzon denied that his chief had admitted the reasonableness of Russia having a fortified naval port also. If he did not, he must have been more short-sighted than I take him to be. Russia has warships in the Chinese waters. She knows that we are stronger than she on the sea, therefore she naturally desires to have a naval base, where, if the necessity arises, her ships can find refuge. Russia has the two ports, and had we gone to war with her to prevent it, the only result would have been that she would have laid hands on all Manchuria outside Port Arthur, and very probably have advanced on Pekin. We ought, say the Jingoes, to have entered into an alliance with Japan or with some other Power. It takes two to make an alliance, and I doubt whether Japan would have become our ally against Russia. The latter has practically ceded Corea to her. This is all that Japan wanted, and why should she have fought with us against Russia, when she could secure what she wanted without fighting? Germany has utilised the occasion by herself getting hold of a port. Any one, not absolutely blind, must have perceived that this was done with the consent and approval of Russia. Germany, therefore, was not likely to become our ally in a war against Russia. Nor was France, as an offensive and defensive alliance exists between her and Russia. Probably, neither France nor Germany nor Japan regrets that our absolute supremacy in the Far East has ceased. Each is stronger there by there being two roads from Europe to the East—one ours, and the other Russia's. Where, then, are our allies to be found? China herself would have been on the side of Russia. Li Hung Chang, who seems now to direct her councils, is no fool. He knows that Russia is the only European Power that China has to fear, owing to her territorial proximity and her huge land forces. He therefore seeks to create many foreign interests in China, and thus to secure the independence of his country by maintaining, so far as he can, a balance of power there between those who might assail it. This is the wisest policy that China, under the circumstances, can pursue. Many a weak State in Europe has been long-lived because of the multitude of kind friends, each one of whom wishes to swallow the oyster itself. In this, far from running counter to our policy, the Chinese statesman is aiding it.

Lord Salisbury had the merit of perceiving that, whether we like it or dislike it, Russia must be paramount in Manchuria, and, being paramount, would obtain her two ports there. We could no more prevent it than we could single-handed prevent Germany from laying hands on a Swiss Canton. Whilst, therefore, his colleagues blustered, and whilst his Party organs breathed war and vengeance, he declined to run our heads against a stone wall. His aim seems to have been to do his best, under the circumstances, to protect our trade with China proper. In this he had my heartiest support, and the more he was abused by his own side, the more did I deem him worthy of the respect of all who are not affected with Jingo "swelled-headism." I saw no reason why he should not obtain an assurance from China that she would never alienate any portion of her central Provinces, for this in no way binds us to go to war with her or any other Power if she did. It was a harmless sop to his Jingo followers. He secured that an Englishman should be at the head of the Chinese Custom House so long as our trade with China exceeds that of any other Power, and that the rivers of China should be open to foreign navigation. These were substantial gains to us, and they in no way militated against the "open door." But what was my horror when I read one morning that he had obtained from China a lease of Wei-hai-wei! I awaited anxiously to hear Mr. Balfour's explanation of this change of policy, and the explanation was by no means satisfactory. The Gulf of Pechili is a deep indentation of the sea between Manchuria and China proper. The main importance of this Gulf is due to its being the water-way towards Pekin. At the entrance to the Gulf there are two promontories, one hundred miles apart. On the Northern promontory Port Arthur is situated; on the Southern, Wei-hai-wei, and to the south of the latter promontory, but outside the Gulf, there is the German port, the hinterland of which separates Wei-hai-wei from the rest of China. So far as I could understand Mr. Balfour's explanation, we have secured this lease, without any very definite idea whether we intend to convert the port into a great naval base, or even into a fortified coaling station. If we do not, of what use is it? If we do, the fortifications will cost us several millions, for they would have to be very extensive owing to the port being commanded by the hills in the rear of it, and we shall have to keep a garrison there of at least 10,000 men, which would cost us at least one million per annum. I deny that such a fortress would be of the slightest advantage to us. Were the Russians to advance against Pekin, they would not traverse the Gulf of Pechili, but would move by land. Our tenure of Wei-hai-wei would no more affect this advance than would our tenure of a fortress in Patagonia. If we are masters of the sea, we should, in the event of war with Russia, blockade the Russian fleet in Port Arthur, and we can do this, whether we have a naval base or a fortified coaling-station on the southern promotory of the entrance to the Gulf of Pechili or not. It is, indeed, a moot point amongst naval experts whether, having Hong Kong, we do not rather weaken than strengthen our position in Chinese waters by dividing our forces owing to our having two naval bases. If Lord Salisbury had been able openly to express his views he would, through Mr. Balfour, I make no doubt, have said that he had secured the lease of Wei-hai-wei, not because he thought that it was of any advantage to us, but because the Jingo feeling ran so strong amongst his followers and some of his colleagues, that he had to do something to maintain their allegiance. Wei-hai-wei is, in fact, in the nature of a sugar-plum that a mother puts in the mouth of a child to stop its howls.

What, then, should a Radical do under present circumstances? He should not ally himself with Jingoes in attacking Lord Salisbury because he is not a Jingo. But, respecting the Premier for having so long struggled against the Jingo wave, he should register his dissent to this "graceful concession" to Jingoism. The Liberal Party should, after the vacation, speak clearly. It should not complain of the Premier for not having dragged us into war with Russia in a wild endeavour to prevent what cannot be prevented, nor for having declined to bark without intending to bite if the bark did not frighten Russia; it should not aid and abet those of his colleagues and his followers who would have him relinquish the post of Foreign Secretary because he is not as recklessly Jingo as they are; it should handsomely recognise much that the Premier has done in the cause of peace. But it should also firmly dissent to this expensive Wei-hai-wei folly.

What these Jingoes really want I never yet have discovered. They are singularly vague about their aspirations. They are not satisfied with the lease of Wei-hai-wei. They seem to be under the impression that if we had shown a bold front, and ordered Russia to withdraw from Port Arthur, withdraw she at once would. They seem to be suffering from a new form of Chinamania. They imagine that, if we were to head a crusade against Russia, France, Germany and Japan would join us, and that if they did not, our navy would drive the Russians out of Manchuria. There is really nothing too silly for these silliest of human beings to believe. They have been so blatant and boastful since they have been able to spend our substance in outbuilding the world in ships, that they are seriously convinced that we can dictate the law to every nation on the globe. To discuss with them is like arguing with a lunatic; and actual facts are as much thrown away on them as arguments. They live in a world of their own imagining.

We have little commerce with Manchuria. It is a barbarous country, where the Chinese authorities never had either influence or power. If Russia annexed it to-morrow, and were to build railroads through it, we should be commercially the gainers, notwithstanding Russia's hostile tariffs. In China proper our commerce has nothing to fear except from competition. Our aim should be to maintain the treaties that give us a free access to the country. These treaties have not yet been assailed. We have Hong Kong. Russia and Germany have now also a naval and commercial basis in Chinese waters and France is to have one. We are, therefore, all four on an equality so far as regards ports. We should do nothing to alter this balance of power. I agree with Mr. Balfour that the time will probably come when all the Powers will consent to make China, by solemn declaration, a free-trade preserve, for this is to the interest of each one separately. They are far more likely to do this, now that there is a balance of power in the Far East, than when our will was law. In the meantime, let us at least show our good faith. Whilst protesting against exclusive advantages to others, let us prove our belief in this policy by not seeking to obtain them for ourselves so long as our treaties are not attacked. Whilst, like sensible men, we must look to our interests, let us drop the wretched cant of pretending that we are actuated by a spirit of universal philanthropy. This nonsense deceives no one, and only causes us to be distrusted by every one. Whilst able to do much in safeguarding these interests, let us not delude ourselves into the idea that our ships can win us battles on the dry land, or that we can expand without let or hindrance, and at the same time prevent other countries from doing the same. If we had been in the geographical position of Russia, does any one doubt that we should long before now have discovered that it was our manifest destiny to become the possessors of Manchuria? First we should have sent missionaries there to convert the blinded heathen to Christianity. Then, on the plea that some of the missionaries had been maltreated, we should have sent an army to look after them. That army would have remained. We should have extended our protection to the Manchurians, and this protection would have soon drifted into annexation. Why, then, make a fuss about Russia doing in her way what we should have done in our way? We occupy Egypt because we consider that, having India, we ought to own the gate to India; and now we are taking the Soudan because it is next door to Egypt. Every argument that we can set up against the action of Russia in Manchuria tells against our occupation of Egypt. If Russia has not been straightforward with us, have we maintained our pledge to occupy Egypt only temporarily? I do not believe in Russia's promises and pledges. In what she is likely to do, I am guided by the knowlege of her persistent policy for more than a century. That policy is to secure for herself outlets to the sea. Wherever she has attempted this, we have sought to hinder her, whether it has been in Europe or in Asia. She has been fully aware that she cannot cope with us on the sea. To meet this, she has, therefore, made her way by land to the Far East. Can we blame her? Can we resist her advance? Would it be reasonable to do so, if we could? If not, then it is surely more befitting to accept facts, than impotently to rail against them, like a flock of cackling, angry geese.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON AT CLOSE QUARTERS.

Just before the Easter holidays I received the following letter, which I will do my best to answer:—

Hotel Provence, Cannes.
April 2, 1898

Dear Labouchere,—I see that in this week's Truth you give advice to those whom you describe as "temperance mad."

Now I want to bring you to close quarters on this matter

I want to know what you really mean and what you definitely advise.

For, in spite of everything which has been done to prevent it, the drink question has become one of "practical politics," and it behoves you—one of our few sound political instructors—to state your own position and to state distinctly what you think ought to be done to obtain the desired reform in the drinking habits of the nation.

So, here follow a few questions which I shall be pleased if you will answer.

First of all I may say that I quite agree with you that more good would be done by closing the liquor shops on Saturday nights than on Sundays. It is on Saturday, usually, that the men have their wages in their pockets, and if drink shops were not open, a vast deal more of their wages would go to their wives and families than goes to them at present. Then, even if the shops were still open on the Sunday, the men's pockets would probably be empty, and Bung would not reap his present harvest.

Old Lord Bramwell, who hated the very name of "Temperance Men," nevertheless said, "Saturday, pay day, drink day, crime day."

I marvel that one so shrewd as you should have been taken in by the publicans' cant about "secret drinking" arising from Sunday closing. How can they know about it if it is "secret"?

Moreover, all impartial evidence and inquiry, Committees Commissions, and so forth, have proved that there is no evidence at all of this "secret drinking." So "Clear your mind of cant," on that point.

But now for my questions dealing with your assertion—"Never was the liquor trade more powerful. This is due to the tactics of the Temperance men, and until they alter them they are doomed to failure."

I agree that the liquor trade is, for the present, more powerful than ever—if by "powerful" is meant more wealthy and, in a way, influential. Beer is king, and this I think would be admitted to be true by anybody who is in the least behind the scenes in politics.

My questions are three:—

1st. Who are the Temperance men to whom you refer?

Are we not now all Temperance men? If there be an avowedly "Temperance Party," I have not yet heard of it.

2nd. What are the "tactics" to which you refer, which have been practised by those especially anxious to promote temperance, and which have made the trade more powerful?

Have the enactments for Sunday closing in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales tended to enrich the trade? Their frantic endeavours to get rid of these enactments are curious, if such be the case.

Was it bad tactics to fight the Tory Government on their compensation scheme, which Mr. Gladstone described as "Endowment of Public Houses"?

Would the Trade have been to-day less strong and powerful if Messrs. Ritchie and Goschen had succeeded in their effort to turn a licence held from year to year into a freehold?

Have the Temperance men been wrong in supporting Sir William Harcourt and the Liberal Party in an effort to give poor men the same opportunity of protecting themselves from public houses which is now enjoyed by rich landowners?

Ought the Temperance men to have opposed or rejected this measure, on which Mr. Gladstone said the Liberal Party were united as one man?

Ought they to have begun to amend and alter Sir W. Harcourt's Bill and put it in danger, because each individual Temperance man thought he could embody his own pet idea in some part or other of the Bill?

Was it bad tactics to accept and support the Bill as going altogether in the right direction, and being substantially what the Temperance men wanted?

Is it bad tactics to work like blacks at every bye-election in favour of the candidate who will give the people the power offered to them in Sir W. Harcourt's Bill, and to bring over a certain number of electors from the Conservative side, who would never vote for a Liberal except on Temperance grounds?

Is it bad tactics to show that there is still in England a "residuum" who look upon politics as something more than a miserable game between the "ins" and the "outs," and who wish to use their political power really to make people somewhat better and happier?

3rd. What are the new tactics to which you refer, in favour of which the Temperance men are to alter their old ones?

This is an important question, for hitherto I have seen no definite statement of what this alternative policy is to be.

No doubt Herbert Gladstone has condemned further support of the veto, and, feeling at the same time that he must suggest something else, has advocated eight items of reform in the licensing system—very good ones, I dare say—but as I do not know who, what, or where his active supporters are, I think his scheme can hardly be considered in the practical politics category.

Your suggestion, as I understand it, vague though it be, points to this. You say, "You Temperance men have worked for nobody knows how long to obtain the Local Veto. For years and years everybody laughed at, despised, and kicked you. At last the Liberal Party took up your reform and embodied it in a Bill. The Liberal Party were defeated at the General Election, on all sorts of issues. Therefore, you Temperance men, please to drop your agitation, and start afresh with something else which it will require another generation to get people to understand, and an additional one to get them to ask for."

Is this common sense?

Answer with deliberation.

Ever yours, W. Lawson.

1. I assert that, what with the bonâ-fide traveller, and what with clubs of a dozen or more men subscribing together to buy a quantity of beer to drink on Sundays, it is an open question whether the Sunday Closing Act has reduced drinking on that day in many districts of Wales. Naturally, the publicans object to being debarred from making their retail profit on Sundays, but I doubt whether the brewers suffer from this. I call it "secret drinking" because the members of these drinking clubs drink privately, i.e., amongst themselves. I derive my knowledge, not from publicans, but from what I have seen, and what has been told me by persons who have no connection either with publicans or with brewers.

2. The "Temperance men" to whom I refer are those who are for the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill of Sir William Harcourt.

3. The tactics to which I refer are those which insist on regarding the moderate use of intoxicating liquor as a crime, and fighting the liquor question on this ground. The majority of the electors are not of this opinion, and consequently they are somewhat repelled from a movement which is based upon a view in which they do not concur. On the other hand, I think that the majority of the electors are in favour of reducing the excessive amount of spirituous liquors drunk, because this leads to intemperance, and even where it does not, results in men spending a great deal too much of their money in drink.

4. It was not bad tactics to fight such a compensation scheme as would have rendered it practically impossible to enable the inhabitants of a district, either to put an end to public-houses within it, or to reduce their numbers, owing to the cost involved. I believe, however, that there is a strong feeling that the working publican should receive some moderate compensation, if suddenly deprived of the business that he has acquired under the protection of the law, and of any return of the money that he has expended in fitting up his business premises. Therefore, I would have this paid, as a means to buy off their opposition, and thus grease the wheels of reform.

5. The Temperance men were not wrong in supporting Sir William Harcourt's Bill, because it was to all intents and purposes their Bill. But they were tactically wrong in making their Bill one which was not likely to be carried. It is, moreover, bad tactics to make support of a Parliamentary candidate depend upon his agreeing to vote for a scheme of dealing with the liquor traffic which experience shows is not generally popular, even amongst Liberals. The scheme involves a plébiscite which, whether a good or bad thing, is novel, and therefore indisposes those—and their number is large—who prefer the existing system of legislating through representative bodies. The Bill made each ward in a town a separate area. This would, were publichouses prohibited in one ward, have increased the drinking in the adjacent wards. The inhabitants of the area might allow publichouses, or put an entire end to them; but they could not reduce the number, or regulate hours of sale. This would have left things precisely as they are in most parts of the country, for in very few areas would a required two-thirds majority be obtained for total abolition. The Bill outran the scent.

6. I do not know what Mr. Herbert Gladstone's plan is. This is mine:—

Give to all municipalities, and to all District Councils, or, if it be preferred, to all Parish Councils, the full right to deal with the liquor traffic and all concerning it within the areas of their respective jurisdictions

Pass a general law that the man who sells beer on licensed premises must be the bonâ-fide owner of the licence, and that no one man can hold directly or indirectly more than one licence.

Grant to the bonâ-fide owner of a licence and the vendor of beer in the licensed premises a right to have his licence for, say, five years, provided that he does not misuse it. At the end of this term let him have no right to any compensation if his licence is not continued. Should the Municipality, or Council (township or village) decide to put an end to the licence before the expiration of the five years, then allow him to claim compensation for the period not elapsed. The money for this compensation might be provided by a tax on all remaining public-houses in the area, when only some in it are suppressed. Where all are suppressed, it might come, in towns from the ratepayers of the town; in counties, from the ratepayers of the county. It is true that the holder of a licence has no legal right to its renewal from year to year. But as a matter of fact, this right is generally, indeed almost universally, recognised in practice.

I am only suggesting a plan broadly. It would, of course, have to be carefully worked out in all its details. Were it the law, all Temperance men will, I think, admit that it would be a change for the better on the present state of things. It might, I believe, be carried; all Radicals who believe in local self-government, whether Temperance men or not, would vote for it. So would all those who, without wishing to close all public-houses, yet believe that much might be done to reduce the temptations to intemperance by regulating the liquor traffic. I confess that I do not think that the cause of Temperance, on the lines of the Harcourt Bill, is promising. Rightly or wrongly, many of the Liberal candidates who were defeated at the General Election ascribe their defeat to having advocated it. Many, too, of the Liberals in Parliament, who got in by the skin of their teeth, are inclined to throw it over. I doubt whether it is likely to become a plank again in any Liberal programme. Under these circumstances, it seems to me—apart from the merits or demerits of the Harcourt scheme—tactics somewhat akin to knocking our heads against a shut door, to continue to fight on the lines of the Harcourt Bill, instead of seeking to discover some other and easier road to the attainment of our object. It is a mistake to become so enamoured of the means to a given end, as to subordinate end to means. What is the end desired? That the people in a locality should have authority over the liquor traffic, just as they have authority over many other local matters. How do they obtain this authority over other matters? By authority being placed in the hands of their elected representatives. The bed rock of our scheme of government is the delegation of power to elected representatives. Why, then, not work on this line? It is the line of the least resistance, and this, in my humble judgment, is always the best line to take. For years and years, there has been a zealous and persistent warfare on behalf of Temperance. Not one step in advance has been made by legislation in this direction. Surely this tells its own tale.

THE PRESS AND THE PATENT AGENT.

Since commenting recently on a "Grand Inventions Competition" run by sundry newspapers in London and the Provinces, I have acquired further information which adds considerable force to the objections then urged against this novelty in newspaper enterprise. I have also received from the firm of patent agents concerned in the competition a letter which throws valuable light on the whole business. In order that the value of this letter may be exactly appreciated, it will be convenient if I reproduce in the first place from Truth, of March 10, the remarks to which it refers. They were as follows:—

> A month or two before Christmas a number of provincial journals—I am sorry to say that the Leeds Mercury (weekly) was one of them—started a "Grand Inventions Competition." The condition of entry was that the inventors who competed took out provisional protection or full patents for their productions, through the medium of the paper, paying three and a half guineas in the former case and eleven in the latter. These were represented as "reduced" fees, and to add to the inducement to compete, a first prize was offered of fifteen guineas, a second prize in the shape of a complete patent value twelve guineas, and a third a provisional protection value four guineas, beside fifty silver medals, fifty bronze medals, and fifty diplomas of honour. The announcement of the competition was seasoned with the most extravagant flim-flams about the fortunes to be made out of patents for common articles in everyday use.
> Now, it will be clear to any one with a glimmering of technical knowledge that such a competition must necessarily be an utter farce. One competitor, we will say, submits a new idea in boot-jacks, a second an improved mangle, a third a novelty in ship's steering-gear. How on earth can any expert that ever lived decide fairly on the respective merits of these inventions? A competition in which every one should submit a new invention for one and the same purpose would be reasonable and legitimate, but a competition between inventions which have absolutely nothing in common as a basis of comparison is as nonsensical as the Caucus race in "Alice in Wonderland." But this is only one objection. If the competition is to be genuine, every pains ought to be taken to ascertain that the successful specifications can really be the subject of a valid patent. It is a scandal, indeed, if the proprietors of a great newspaper are going to take four or ten guineas from an impecunious enthusiast for obtaining a patent which will be upset as soon as granted. How far was this done by the journals which promoted the competition in question? One instance will show. A sceptic, who saw the mischievous folly of the whole thing, purchased in a shop a window-sash fastener which had been patented in 1886, and sent it as his contribution to the competition. In due course he was awarded a diploma of merit; and—not the least significant point in the story—received communications from the "Patent Editors" of the Leeds Mercury offering to obtain him full protection at the further reduced fee of nine guineas (this offer only to be open for a fortnight), and suggesting the desirability of taking out patents on the Continent and in America. This incident proves up to the hilt that no attempt, worthy of the name, was made to test the novelty of the inventions submitted for competition.

The article went on to mention other significant facts. It pointed out that the competition was run on the same lines in several papers simultaneously, and that when the prizes were awarded there was only one set of winners for the whole series of competitions; in other words, that what was held out as an enterprise started by each paper for the benefit of its own readers was really a joint undertaking of several papers in different parts of England, or more probably "the undertaking of some individual in the background—presumably a patent agent or firm of patent agents—using the names of all these papers." It was shown that in at least one case the conditions had been violated by allowing the competitor to pay fees and enter after the nominal date of the closing of the competition. It was further mentioned that one of the competitors—a working man—on learning these facts, brought an action in the County-Court against the Leeds Mercury to recover the fees he had paid; that the defendants obtained an order for the removal of the action into the High Court, and that upon this the plaintiff, not having the means to fight under such conditions, abandoned his action. Finally, it was pointed out that combination among the aggrieved parties for their own protection was rendered impossible by the fact that the names and addresses of competitors could not be obtained.

My surmise that the whole competition was really the enterprise of an ingenious patent agent in the background turns out to have been correct. The agent concerned is a Mr. G. H. Rayner, or his firm, Messrs. Rayner & Co., of 37, Chancery-lane. After cogitating for three weeks upon the TRUTH article, this gentleman wrote me the following letter—I say that he himself wrote it, in view of the intimation upon it that it was "Dictated by Mr. Rayner":—

37, Chancery-lane, London, W.C.,
March 31, 1898.

The Editor of TRUTH,
TRUTH Buildings, Carteret-street,
Queen Anne's-gate, S.W.

Dictated by Mr. Rayner.

DEAR SIR,—Our attention has been called to an article in TRUTH of March 10, 1898, commenting upon an "Inventions Competition." As we acted as Patent Editors for the competition referred to in this article, we trust you will allow us to call attention to your remarks. Fair comment we think is the right of every newspaper, but we also think that the Proprietors of TRUTH would not desire to put forward a distinctly untrue statement.

We beg, therefore, to call attention to page 592 commencing at line 41 of TRUTH, dated March 10, which reads as follows:—"The condition of entry was that the inventors who competed took out provisional protection or full patent for their productions through the medium of the paper, paying three and a half guineas in the former case, and eleven guineas in the latter." It may interest you to know that this statement is distinctly false. There was no such condition in the competition there commented upon. Every competitor was free to get his Protection or Patent from any source that he thought best, and, as an instance, we beg to quote you the first prize winner in this competition who took out his own Provisional Protection amongst others. Some competitors obtained the Protection through other Patent Agents. The first prize winner above referred to was Mr. T. A. Langhorne, of 62, Kirkgate, Silsden, near Keighley, Yorkshire, and if it should be important to the proprietors of TRUTH to ascertain if the statements put forward are strictly accurate, they can verify this statement of ours for themselves by communicating with Mr. Langhorne.

In another part of your article you mention that "a sceptic, who saw the mischievous folly of the whole thing, purchased in a shop a window-sash fastener which had been patented in 1886, and sent it as his contribution to the competition." We should like here to give a little explanation of this matter upon which possibly you are not aware. The "sceptic" in question submitted a sash-fastener, and at the same time signed a declaration at present in the possession of the Comptroller of H.M. Patent Office, and the declaration was to the following effect, "that I (sceptic) am the true and first inventor thereof, and that the same is not in use by any other person or persons to the best of my knowledge and belief." Upon the strength of this declaration "sceptic" was entered into the competition and we leave it to your judgment of fair play if this was a proper thing to do, when it was distinctly stated in the competition conditions that no "old invention" was eligible. The judges of the competition took the declaration to be an honest one, as they could not possibly go into the question of novelty of the inventions submitted, which you will be aware is very often for the jurisdiction of the High Courts of Justice, and it is not to be expected that when 30,000 Patent applications are made per annum that the judges of a competition of this kind can enter into the question of novelty or infringement of every invention submitted. It would take our Law Courts years to decide.

Many of your other comments are extremely unfair, and we can only wonder that you did not ascertain the strict accuracy of the statements you make before putting them to the British public.

In addressing this communication to you we are acting entirely on our own behalf, and can, if needs be, substantiate every statement made. We feel sure that TRUTH will regret having even made one statement which is untrue, and that you will not take it as unfair that we called your attention to this article.—Yours faithfully,
RAYNER & Co.

P.S.—We enclose you a sample of the application form for a protection or patent, which every competitor signed, and such a form as this was signed by the "sceptic" referred to in your paper.

On comparing this letter with the substance of the original article set out above, the reader will at once see for himself that it answers nothing. The remarks on the illusory nature of the competition, on the concealment of the fact that the same offer was made through several papers simultaneously, the allegations respecting violation of the conditions, and the action against the Leeds Mercury—all these points are discreetly passed over. Like every clever controversialist with a weak case, Mr. Rayner lays hold of one incidental inaccuracy—if it was an inaccuracy—and does his best to make it appear that in correcting this he is disposing of all criticism. The alleged inaccuracy is that it was a condition of entry that protection should be taken out "through the medium of the paper." It may interest me, Mr. Rayner says, to know that this statement is "distinctly false." It does, indeed, interest me immensely. I wrote the article with the conditions before me, and I interpreted the conditions to have this meaning; and I recognise now, after Mr. Rayner has pointed it out, that the conditions do not say in so many words that protection "must" be taken out through the paper, or its "patent editors." But Mr. Rayner will permit me to remark that if I, reading his conditions, placed upon them an interpretation which was "distinctly false," the chances are that nine out of ten competitors who entered fell into precisely the same error. So far, therefore, from regretting, as Mr. Rayner anticipates I shall do, "having made one statement which is untrue," I rejoice greatly at having illustrated, by falling into the mistake myself, the pitfall which Mr. Rayner's conditions contain for the thousands of more or less uneducated and illiterate people to whom his offer was made. Mr. Rayner points out that certain competitors did not take out protection through the "patent editors" of the papers. Will he tell me, on the other hand, how many did? And will he tell me, out of those who did not, how many had previously taken out protection through other channels, and, therefore, could not possibly avail themselves of his kind offices? Will he also kindly answer another point? Although in the published advertisements in the newspapers it was not said in so many words that protection must be taken out through him, as patent editor, did he never in his subsequent correspondence with the competitors insist peremptorily on their employing his firm? Before he answers that question will he kindly glance at the following letter, written by his firm in their character of "patent editors," to an intending competitor:—

37, Chancery-lane, London, W.C.,
December 17, 1897.

DEAR SIR,—If we have a model by Monday next, it will be in time for the Competition.

If the Protection has not been already taken, the enclosed form must be duly signed and returned to us, together with the fee, otherwise we cannot enter the matter into the Competition.—Yours faithfully,
RAYNER & Co.

In the face of this letter (and I have in my possession others in similar terms) I shall, until Mr. Rayner gives me reason for altering my opinion, regard his assertion that competitors were not required to take out protection through him, as a disingenuous quibble. We have it (1) that every competitor was absolutely compelled to take out protection somehow; (2) that reduced fees were offered as an inducement to take it out through the "patent editors"; (3) that all the necessary drawings, models, &c., had to be sent by each competitor to the "patent editors"; (4) that the "patent editors" themselves write to competitors, enclosing form of application for protection, and stating that it must be returned to them with the fee if the invention is to be entered for the competition. In the face of these facts, Mr. Rayner calls it "distinctly false" to say that it was one of the conditions that competitors should take out protection through his firm. I would recommend him when he next finds it necessary to contradict a statement which is substantially true to word his denial a little more carefully, or he may incur a charge of "distinct falsehood" himself.

As for Mr. Rayner's other point about the "sceptic" who sent in a second-hand sash-fastener with a declaration that it was his own original invention, Mr. Rayner must really forgive me for declining to take him seriously when he appeals to my "judgment of fair play" as to the propriety of this proceeding. The "declaration" in question was a signed statement on the form of application for protection—not, of course, a sworn declaration. The "sceptic" wanted to test the value of the competition, and he resorted to an obvious stratagem for the purpose. His stratagem had the desired effect, and has furnished one of the best pieces of evidence of the delusive character of the whole competition. I should as soon think of saying that this was unfair or improper as I should think of condemning a detective who assumes a fictitious name, or puts on a false nose when engaged on hunting down a party who is "wanted."

It will be noted that in this connection Mr. Rayner expressly declares that the judges "could not possibly go into the question of novelty of the inventions submitted." Probably this is true, and, if it is, it cuts away the whole of Mr. Rayner's case, and conclusively establishes the accuracy of my comments. I said that "it is a scandal indeed if the proprietors of great newspapers are going to take four or ten guineas from an impecunious enthusiast for obtaining a patent which will be upset as soon as granted." We now have it from Mr. Rayner, the "Patent Editor" of a score of journals which have run such competitions, that it is absolutely impossible for the judges to pronounce any opinion upon the validity of the inventions submitted to them. In other words, the whole of these newspapers, in company with their "Patent Editors," are prepared to take without demur the guineas of any sanguine idiot among their readers, who is induced by an offer of cash prizes and medals to enter for one of these competitions, no matter how stale or worthless the invention he may submit. If this is not a scandal, I do not know what is.

Now let us take a general survey of the "Grand Inventions Competition," and the relations which it discloses between the Press, the competitors, and Mr. Rayner, or Messrs. Rayner & Co. To begin with, as already stated, the whole thing is purely and simply the speculation of this enterprising firm of patent agents. The newspapers concerned, although the competition is run in their names, and represented as their undertaking, play literally no other part in it than that of the advertising medium. They publish, week after week, announcements which represent the competition as something originated by themselves for the benefit of their readers, and depict in alluring, not to say deceptive, terms the opportunities it offers to anybody who can invent anything. The conditions are roughly indicated, and further particulars are offered on application to the "Patent Editor" or "Patent Department" of the paper. But it is obvious from the wording that all these announcements are drawn up by Messrs. Rayner & Co.; and it is quite certain that the newspapers do not give the prizes, for, as already mentioned, one set of prizes does duty for the competitors in half a dozen papers. Morever, when the application for particulars is once sent in to the "Patent Department," the answer comes from the office of Messrs. Rayner & Co., 37, Chancery-lane, with whom all subsequent communications and negotiations with reference to the competition are conducted. In communicating with the competitors, Rayner & Co. simply head their ordinary office stationery with the name of the newspaper through which the particular competitor they are addressing happens to have been introduced, and 37, Chancery-lane is for the time being styled the "Patent Department" of that particular paper. What the financial arrangements may be between Rayner & Co. and the various newspapers whose names they thus use, I do not pretend to know, but on the face of it Rayner & Co. are simply in the position of advertisers who are allowed not only to insert their advertisement in the paper, but to make use of the name of the paper afterwards in the ordinary course of their business. The competition can be worth little or nothing to the paper for the purpose of extending its own circulation, and presumably, therefore, whatever advantages it gains from the transaction are derived from the profits of Messrs. Rayner & Co.

It is to be presumed that Rayner & Co. pay substantially for the accommodation. What would their position be if they ran such a competition on their own account? Imagine Rayner & Co., or any other firm of patent agents, offering prizes, medals, and diplomas for the best new invention of any kind, and inviting people all over the country to compete, subject to the condition that they must patent their inventions, Rayner & Co. offering to do the business for them at reduced terms! Would-be inventors are proverbially a foolish and sanguine class, but this dodge would probably be a little too thin even for them. But when such an invitation is held out by widely-circulated and influential newspapers, such as the Leeds Mercury, the Western Mail, or the Newcastle Chronicle, acting and offering the prizes in their own names, and representing the competition and the arrangements for taking out protection as having been organised by them (through their "patent editors") on public grounds and for the benefit of their readers, then the thing stands on a totally different footing, and no one will be surprised to hear that competitors have come forward and paid their fees literally by hundreds. To assume, therefore, that Rayner & Co. have paid substantially for the valuable privilege of acting as the "patent editors" of all these journals, is only to assume that the proprietors of these papers conduct their business on ordinary business principles. But in this particular instance what is the business? It is, without exaggeration, one of the most questionable enterprises in which any respectable newspaper ever embarked, and its result has been, as it was bound to be, the wholesale victimising of hundreds upon hundreds of simple-minded and credulous people. In order to show this more fully, I will give in a future article some further facts and observations concerning this astonishing development of journalism.

A CHAPTER ON USURY.

I have very little sympathy with a young man who anticipates his means by borrowing at 60 per cent. of a money-lender, nor with a man of the world who has reached what are called years of discretion, and borrows at this rate to meet some temporary requirement. If, after a few years, a spendthrift finds his way into the Bankruptcy Court, this may be unpleasant to him, but the State suffers no harm. The money does not disappear, it only goes from the pocket of one person into that of another, and the circulation of money, from the public standpoint, is rather an advantage than the reverse. The really objectionable part of this class of money-lending is the blackmailing that is practised on relatives of the borrower. If a young man has an allowance from his family of, say, £500 per annum, it is evident that if he gives bills for £1,000, they cannot be paid by him, and that if they are paid, it must be by his relatives. The security for repayment, therefore, is the probability of his relatives coming to his aid, rather than allow him to pass through the Bankruptcy Court. It is in cases such as this that I should be glad to see the Courts invested with a power of giving equitable relief. I would go further than Sir George Lewis, and allow them to relieve the debtor of his liability, which would practically mean relieving his relatives of it. Were the Courts given this power, it would put an end to all lending on the expectation of relatives paying.

Last week I went into the Committee room, where the Money-Lending Committee was sitting. A money-lender said that an equitable power to reduce interest would not diminish his business, because those to whom he lent were men of honour. He seemed indeed to regard a bill discounted at 40 or 60 per cent. as a sacred debt of honour. But where the honour came in I could not see. The borrower confederates with the lender to oblige his parents or other relatives to pay for his extravagances. That a money-lender regards a forged bill as the best of securities, the evidence before the Committee has clearly proved. It is only natural that he should; for here the leverage on relatives is so great that, if they have the means, the bill is almost certain to be paid. This is a very difficult matter to meet. I would suggest that it might be done by providing that no bill for which the borrower has paid, or has covenanted to pay, more than two per cent., whether in the form of interest or commission, shall be recoverable against any person who has received no consideration for signing it, unless the lender has personally seen this person, and obtained in writing from him an assurance that he has signed it.

The hardest cases, however, are not those which arise out of "West End" usury. They are those where the loan is small in amount. Some curate or clerk borrows at extortionate interest. After slaving and scraping for years to pay the interest, in the end he finds it impossible, and is ruined. In all such cases there should be an equitable power of relief vested in the Courts. Equally cruel are the cases where there is a bill of sale. A loan is contracted at 100, or more, per cent. Repayment and interest are arranged for by monthly payments, and there is generally a clause by which the entire debt becomes due with usurious interest upon default in any one of these payments. Some payments are made, then there is a failure to pay, and at once the poor borrower finds a man in possession of his home. The sale takes place, and the ruined borrower's little household goods are sold for a mere song.

Here, too, the Courts should have an equitable jurisdiction. But I would go further. I would put an end to bills of sale. It is true that bills of sale are registered, and any one who reads the Gazette may know who has given one. But the butcher and the baker of some country town do not read this publication. They—often kind-hearted men—give a little credit, and they find themselves deprived of any possibility of being repaid by the moneylender stepping in with his bill of sale. Yet a further step would I go. I would with pleasure vote for a "Furniture Bill" on the lines of the Homestead Act of Manitoba. Furniture belonging to any person with a wife and children, or (in the event of the wife having died) with children alone, below the value of, say, £100, should not be made liable for his debts. Why should his furniture be liable, any more than the clothes in which he and his family are standing?

It may be instructive to give here the latest example of the working of the bill of sale trick that has come under my notice. The usurer concerned in the case is one J. Harrison Brown, of 25, Bedford-row, W.C., who has not yet attained the notoriety which he merits. A lady, in temporary want of a loan of £10, applied to a usurer's tout named Milner, of High Holborn. Milner persuaded her that she must borrow £30, and give a bill of sale on her furniture. He then introduced her to Harrison Brown, and she was induced to sign a bill of sale on furniture of the value of £200 for a loan of £30. Milner went with her to the bank to cash Harrison Brown's cheque for the £30, and appropriated £4 out of that amount for his commission. The loan was to be repaid, with interest, in instalments of £2 10s. per month, and three instalments were duly paid. After the second instalment had been paid, the borrower left the house in which she was living, owing to its insanitary state, and removed her furniture to another house without giving Harrison Brown the notice required by the bill of sale—a condition which she knew little about. Harrison Brown accepted one instalment after hearing of the removal, but he returned the next, on the ground that goods included in the bill of sale had been taken away without his consent. In reply to an inquiry as to the amount still secured upon the bill of sale, he stated that it was £37 3s. 7d. This was exactly four months after the £30 (less Milner's commission) had been advanced, and after £7 10s. of this amount had been repaid! The case had gone no further when the facts were communicated to me a few days ago; but Shylock apparently meditated a seizure of the furniture, and I shall not be surprised to hear that by this time it has been carried out. It seems to me that J. Harrison Brown would be a useful witness to summon before the Money-lending Committee. It is evident that valuable information regarding the abuse of bills of sale could be extracted from him.

I was, by the way, particularly interested in the evidence given before the Committee last week by Jonas Wolfe, of Jermyn-street, alias James Wilton, of 215, Piccadilly. He mentioned that, among other aliases, he also trades as Herbert Grunwell, of 4, Oxford-place, Leeds. Last November I had some correspondence with the said Grunwell, who formerly dignified his office with the title of "The Leeds and Counties Clerical Agency," and specially laid himself out for the catching and bleeding of country parsons. Grunwell was hurt at my inclusion of his name in a batch of bloodsuckers against whom I warned my readers. He posed as an injured innocent anxious to clear his reputation until I showed some inquisitiveness as to his relations with the usurer Wolfe, and then he became curiously evasive and reticent. As a matter of fact, I had not up till that time any absolute proof that Grunwell and Wolfe were one, but the correspondence strengthened my suspicion that they were, and the matter is now finally settled by Wolfe's own admission.

A short time back I came across an example of this Wolfe's rapacity as bad as any that has been brought to light before the Committee. The victim was in possession of freehold property of the value of over £60,000, but subject to encumbrances amounting to about £32,000. He wanted a loan of £1,000 or so, and he could, of course, have easily obtained it at 4 per cent. Being however, a foolish and unbusiness-like old man, he fell into the hands of one Tottenham (otherwise Lofthouse & Co., of 2, Marlborough Mansions, S.W.), who passed him on to James Wilton, otherwise Jonas Wolfe, and pocketed a handsome fee for this valuable introduction. Wolfe advanced this gentleman two sums —first, £1,000, for which he undertook to repay £1,600 in twelve equal monthly instalments; and secondly, £500, for which he undertook to repay £800 in six months. Both loans were secured by charges on the estate, and taking into consideration the monthly repayments the interest would, of course, work out at an enormous rate. It is gratifying to know, however, that this appropriately named financial wolf was deprived of the major part of his plunder. The borrower's legal advisers were consulted, and Jonas deemed it prudent to accept £1,700 in settlement of his full claim of £2,400.

EASTER DRAMATIC NOVELTIES.

The guest who knows how to time his exits and his entrances has at least one social asset. I congratulate the American garrison of the Adelphi on the date of their advent. They have chosen, or chanced—in the same swoop—on the sweet o' the year, and on the psychological moment. War is in the air, the Stars and Stripes begin to have a new meaning for English sympathies, and here is a drama of battle which swarms with heroic Americans in war paint. Nothing could be more opportune.

War is, in fact, the chief element of "The Heart of Maryland," and the most interesting. As a play Mr. Belasco's work abounds in faults. It is not a patch, for instance, on "Secret Service," with which it is sure to be confused, and which it resembles. It is badly constructed and monstrously confusing. The author has made a curiously amateurish error—that which damned Charles Lamb's piece in his day, and has damned a million others since—in leaving the audience to discover the different motives of the characters. If Mr. Belasco had made shift to cut the Gordian knot, and printed a short statement of the case upon the programmes, he would have done better for his play than by leaving us to grope our way about its dusky purlieus. Again, Mr. Gillette's work was original, while "The Heart of Maryland," if you except the mechanical advance over its one now forgotten competitor in the bell trick of Act III., smacks, more or less, of old friends and the familiar components of melodrama. But the comparison, though it was inevitable, need not be prolonged, and does not mean to imply that our Belasco is not vastly ingenious I should like a clearer opening, and Colonel Thorpe's position, for instance, might be made more intelligible, but there are some capital situations; as when the heroine's brother, a Southerner by birth like herself, but a spy in the Northern interest among his own people, gets shot, and his sister is made, without knowing it, to denounce her lover as his confederate. But war, as I say, is the real interest, the impersonal hero of the piece. Modern war is more fascinating than Maryland, and the savour of modern warfare is all over the stage. The author's ingenuity lies in the skill with which he has contrived to suggest where other people might have come to grief by giving palpable object lessons. We see wonderfully little of the fighting, but we feel it as we have seldom felt it at the theatre. Artillery, musketry, galloping A.D.C.s echo all round us; wounded men and a wounded child pass across the stage, and are not much like the conventional pictures. It is the ugly, disgusting side of the business, not the glory, pomp, and circumstance. Mr. Belasco—with mounting—has helped to give the pomp and circumstance away. After the Russians, one or two of his own countrymen have done the same in narrative fiction; and it is not a bad compliment to say that "The Heart of Maryland" recalls, with necessary difference, Mr. Stephen Crane's "Red Badge of Courage." Naturally, then, the characters at the Adelphi pale before the bigger phantom, and I refuse to "oblige" with the plot. But the acting is wonderfully good all round. It is a bit vigorous, of course; these Americans act hard—over-act, an enemy might call it, though I should be sorry to seem to lament a fault which some of our own artists might emulate. They have a great turn of speed, too, there is no dawdling; and the nervous tension is infectious and disposes an audience to be thrilled. Mrs. Leslie Carter is rather a revelation. No doubt many of her little arts are transparent, and she is not yet her own mistress. But she has passion and intensity, while in another vein her tenderness with the small and wounded Northener was charming. Mr. Frank Mills's Artillery Lieutenant was a pleasant feature, particularly in his scene—in a room under siege—with a northern damsel who is played as pleasantly by Miss Dupree. But if I am to name the prettiest interlude in the piece, to Miss Helen MacBeth is due that modest tribute. Her entrance and colloquy in delicate American with the luckless spy are charming comedy; Miss MacBeth must not alter it by an intonation. In Mr. Morgan we have got a new and exquisite villain, tense, vivid—too vivid, it may be—and, not least, well-bred. Mr. Barrymore's return to his native isle was hailed with rapture. He has become the Terriss of America, a friend informs me.

Miss Louie Freear is getting one hundred pounds (£100) a week at the Royalty Theatre. You may "hae your doots" as to the good taste of this announcement, but do not question its veracity. If you do, you will find yourself threatened with legal proceedings. My authority upon Miss Freear's income is the lady herself, or, at all events, her solicitor. A vivacious contemporary of mine surprised this rumour, and published it in his columns, adding the terrific comment that if it were true he was delighted. Miss Freear's solicitor leapt upon my contemporary. The remark, he urged, was calculated to injure the actress in her calling; moreover, her income was £100 a week and he himself had drawn up her agreement at that figure. Sweet, sweet are the uses of advertisement. Let me add, for fear I should myself incur an action-at-law, that Miss Freear's solicitor did not actually and physically leap upon my contemporary. In point of fact he wrote a letter to him.

I was glad, however, on Monday evening to find that if Mr. Levenstone is liberal he quite understands the art of getting his money's worth. In "Julia," which has succeeded "Oh! Susannah," on the Royalty stage, Miss Freear has plenty to do for her shekels, or, as she probably prefers to call them, her "Jimmy O'Goblins." She is on tap all the evening, and enjoys a perfect trinity of parts. Plays "written round" a particular artist are not, Heaven knows, a new thing. But I fancy the genre reaches its climax in "Julia." It is not a play. It is simply Miss Louie Freear at discretion, with a certain quantity of other matter to serve by way of ballast; and if one article of ballast, Mr. Robb Harwood to wit, gives us the best piece of acting in the piece, that, I imagine, is no fault of the author's. Julia was a——well, a Miss Louie Freear, and lived in lodgings with her father, Mr. Minniver, a broken-down gentleman, sodden, lying, good for nothing. Tom, her twin brother, lived there, too, but ran away and became a boy in buttons at Mrs. Merridew's. This was a lady with a will of her own, a son, and a solicitor. The last had a daughter, called Clara. She was quite as obviously a lady as Mrs. Merridew, and an excellent marriage for Master Merridew; but when that youth proposed to marry her, his mother at once turned him out of doors, and into the company of Mr. Minniver. Consequently he saw a good deal of Julia, (who was her papa's general servant), though not enough to satisfy the audience and the management of the Royalty. Mrs. Merridew put that all right. She had a plan to let us see more of Miss Freear. Mr. Minniver is her distant relative. If she is to supplant her own criminal offspring, why shouldn't she replace him with Minniver's? Accordingly she advertises for Tom, who is all the time under her own roof, and brilliant in her own buttons. Merridew jumps at the advertisement, but there is no Tom. Need I go on to say that Julia pulls him through? She is transmogrified into Tom. She answers the advertisement. She rings the changes between Tom and Julia. You can imagine the quick change. But even this wouldn't give us enough of Miss Freear for our money, or, rather, for Mr. Levenstone's. So she enacts the veritable page as well—with more quick changes. I might go on to unravel the chain of improbabilities, but I should give myself brain fever, and not be doing Mr. Sturgess any service. That chain untwisted were rope enough to hang him. He has exactly filled the bill. A piece was wanted for Miss Freear, and such a piece is written.

For myself I cannot see too much of the little lady. If she is always the same, it seems to me that she is always irresistible—simply. How long we shall think so is, perhaps, another matter. At least her pathos was as good as her fun (almost) on Thursday evening. Mr. Harwood once more is as good as they make 'em; his "Never"—a type so called, Julia tells us, because it never gets on—is individual in its soddenness. The others—Miss Maria Davis as the Mamma Merridew—are brave auxiliaries.

"Julia" is preceded by a travesty of Kipling's "Light that Failed." One or two ingenuous critics have been surprised to find that it is gloomy. It is not nearly so gloomy as the original Kipling. The difference is that the latter is of gloom compact plus genius. It is a considerable difference, as the critics will find if they compare the play and the novel.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE revival of "Adrienne Lecouvreur," with Mme. Bartet as Adrienne, has brought up again the subject of death by poison on the stage. That accomplished actress does not go in for crude realism and violent effects. She prefers the pathetic to the shocking, in which Mlle. Croizette excelled in "Le Sphinx." I think she is right, but she may not be right ten years hence, it being now the fashion for young ladies to vivisect, and walk the hospitals. Mature playgoers, unless doctors, are not aware how persons dying from poison writhe, groan, cry out, and are contorted in their agony. The robust beauty and strong magnetism of Mlle. Croizette enabled her to die a hideous death without appearing too horrible. But Mme. Bartet is no more fit for such business than a thoroughbred is to draw a cart. She is true to her essential characteristics in clinging to the gracefully pathetic in spite of the cavilling of the realists.

The law courts are in a way to beat the theatres in comedy with strong situations. Who would have thought that the Zola trial was comedy of the most extravagant sort? The Court played a comic part with mock solemnity that appeared real to the laics. The counsel saw that Judges allowed illegalities that would make sure of any judgment being quashed on appeal. The War Minister, advised by the Minister of Justice, who is an advocate by profession, came forward as plaintiff when he had no business to do so. He was merely holding a candle to an excited public, or howling with the wolves. Labori was a comedian from first to last, inasmuch as he understood the drift of the Court and War Minister. But the Generals who appeared as witnesses and the poor jurors were the dupes of the play actors. The Court of Cassation has forgotten its severe majesty by allowing itself to resent the placarding of Deputy Viviani's speech at the cost of the country. Viviani charged a leading member of that Court with being a party to another ugly comedy. The allegation was that he made believe that he was, when Attorney-General, hunting down the worst Panamists, whereas he manœuvred to save them from prescription. He also gave facilities for the destruction of compromising documents. The moral drawn by Demos from the placarded speech is that the Court of Cassation est aussi canaille que la Correctionelle. Poor Demos does not see the exquisite fun of the whole thing. He only thinks of the £75,000,000 which the Panamists filched. It all came out of his pocket, and was the fruit of small savings.

Comte de Greffuhle is so angry at his electoral campaign coming to nought, that he has determined not to build the iron yacht he was to have launched at Dieppe. A hundred workmen were engaged to carry out this fancy. They have all been sent about their business. The Comte spent sums unheard of in France to secure a seat in the Seine et Marne. The total was calculated by his opponent at £80,000.

Who says that love is a creation of the poet? The Princess of Fürstenburg, née Talleyrand, and daughter of the late Duc de Valençay Sagan, proves the contrary. She is aged forty, and has fallen in love with her cousin, the Comte de Castellane, aged thirty. As a consequence, a marriage has been arranged, but it may be delayed, as the fiancé is stricken with typhoid fever. The Princess must, in remarrying, give up her great Fürstenburg dowry. She is fortunately rich in her own right. Her mother, a Castellane Greffuhle, was married first to Count von Hatzfeldt, Prussian Ambassador to the Court of the Tuileries. When the Congress of Paris was busy extricating the Emperor Napoleon from the Crimean muddle, the Count and Countess entertained the Congress at a famous ball.

M. Félix Faure's incognito on the Riviera will be rather transparent. He is to put up at the Riviera Palace Hotel, near the Regina Palace. While there, a division of the Mediterranean Squadron will be "in attendance" at Villafranca. The President enjoys sailing about in men-of-war. To do so makes him feel himself a sea king, and on the watery element the peer of H.B.M. What with the ironclads, the fine horses, and the London straw hats, the President will be able to maintain the dignity of the State and hold his head as high as the most august.

A bit of contemporaneous history. The Czar and F.F. returned from the grand review to Peterhof without an escort. When the latter reached the palace he said to the French Minister in attendance, "Thi-thi-thi-th-i-i-i-i-i, Pas d'escorte! Ça manque de dignité."

The announcement of the Earl of Suffolk's death reminds me of Charlton Park, near Malmesbury, where he resided. I was a guest there not many years ago. Charlton is in the grassy part of Wiltshire. The country around it gently undulates. The house is one of the stateliest in England, in the later Elizabethan style. It stands in a park of the sweetest pastoral beauty, to which the age, size, and number of the trees give an air of majesty. This typical house was built by Sir Henry Knevet, father of Lady Rich, who, by her second marriage, was the first Countess of Suffolk. Historians of James I.'s reign have something to say of her and her daughter, Lady Francis Howard, and successively the wife of the Earl of Essex and Carr, whom George Villiers supplanted in King James's favour. The Charlton house-warming took place in 1603. Raby Castle alone can boast of a hall as fine as that of Charlton. It used to be flagged, for the convenience of carriages containing ladies, but has now a parquet floor. In the olden time a coach and eight could turn round in this hall. The picture-gallery is said to be the longest room of any private residence in England. It is magnificently, genially, and cosily Elizabethan. Have you ever remarked how handsome, kind, and cosy looks a true Elizabethan house? Ancestral portraits cover the wall. Some of them date from the time of Edward VI., when Zucchero was in England. They are interspersed with portraits of Sovereigns, each of which has a history connected with the Suffolk family. That of Queen Elizabeth was sent by herself to her Lord High Admiral, Lord Thomas Howard, first Earl of Suffolk. James I. made a present of his own likeness to that nobleman. It is a revealing one. One can almost see from it that his tongue rolled in his mouth when he talked. The countenance is not Scotch, but Piedmontese, thus justifying Henri IV.'s mot that the British Solomon was the son of David (Rizzio) the fiddler. The Charlton Park gallery is rich in Mytins and contains some Vandykes. They are heirlooms. The present Earl will come of age in September. He spent some weeks here last winter as the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Drake, and made an agreeable impression. He has sweet natural courtesy, a pleasing, open countenance, and though devoted to cricket, cycling, &c., is well educated. He can speak in the Wiltshire vernacular like any Hodge. His sisters are charming country-bred flowers. But to pass one's youth at Charlton Park is in itself an education. The widowed Countess of Suffolk is all-round excellent, and one of the most agreeably frank persons that I know. She has strong genial character, and commands the love and respect of her inner circle. One of her rare characteristics is the most tender and lasting affection for her mother-in-law, now dead many years. One sees her stop before a likeness taken of her when she was elderly, and gaze on it until her eyes swim. For years after her death she could not reconcile herself to the void that event had caused. The late Dowager Countess must have been a woman of singular purity of soul, and intellectual. She was a daughter of Lord Henry Howard, was an aunt of the Hon. Auberon Herbert, and his image, to judge from her portraits. She had a passion for poetry and for gardening. The garden that she laid out in a wide space of turf on the sunny side of the house, is the first in the carpet style that was known in England. Lady Suffolk is descended from the beautiful Countess of Coventry. But it would give her far more pleasure to hear that her daughters resembled her mother-in-law, than her own more famous ancestress.

The Auto-mobile or Motor Club is about to move from its flat in the Place de l'Opéra to the Place de la Concorde. It has arranged to hire there one of the finest houses in Paris, that left to the Pope by the late Marquise de Plessis Bellière for a Nunciature. The executors of her will find they must sell it to liquidate the testator's estate. It was sold by auction for nearly £80,000. But another bid may yet be made before the 12th instant. The internal decorations of this house are by the great artists of the eighteenth century. The walls and ceilings of a small salon were painted by Fragonard.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

We live in the Age of Transition, dear Lady Betty, and we have reached that stage in the process of change at which we are all half-educated. The amount of newspaper knowledge which the members of this generation have assimilated is phenomenal. The humblest man or woman now knows a little of the law and of legal technicalities; a little of the gossip and of the scandal of society; a little of the intricate problems of foreign policy; and, indeed, a little of everything; just sufficient to accentuate their ignorance and make it more dangerous to themselves and to others than it was before.

This being the condition of the community, it is easy to perceive how mischievous government by newspapers may be. Ever since the memorable raid into the Transvaal—that is over two years ago—the Press has directed its search-light in quick succession upon one foreign question after another, keeping the country in continual excitement, dislocating trade, and demoralising the financial markets. First, there was an American war scare; then we were assured that war with Germany was imminent; later, that Russia and Great Britain must inevitably rush at each other's throats over the Eastern Question; and only a week or two ago we were solemnly warned that France and this country were on the verge of a mighty struggle with regard to the West African dispute. We are still at peace, however, with all the nations, and all the nations are at peace with each other! It is well that this lesson should be enforced now, for the disturbed state produced by this system of penny-a-line politics and by the attempt to introduce government by newspapers is very seriously injuring the trade and the business of the country.

Lord Salisbury may not be an ideal Minister for Foreign Affairs, and he may not be so strong as he even was a few years ago, but he has more experience of Foreign Affairs than have all the newspaper editors between them. Moreover, he obtains the very latest information through the representatives of this country abroad, and through the representatives of other countries at home; and the Foreign Office must, therefore, be better and more accurately informed than the editors of newspapers are. It is true that the latter have their "Own Correspondents," who supply them with news sometimes very ably, and frequently incorrectly. It is difficult now to open a London newspaper and not to find some item of foreign news derived from these sources either denied or discredited. For instance, last week the majority of London newspapers contained savagely-written articles founded upon a telegram from Berlin, which gave a report of an alleged interview between a German journalist and Major d'Albuquerque regarding the future policy of Portugal as to Delagoa Bay. On Thursday an official announcement was published, at the express wish both of the Portuguese Government and of Major d'Albuquerque, absolutely denying, first, that the former contemplated the action attributed to it; and, secondly, that the latter had made the statements attributed to him. Government by newspapers is, as I have said, misgovernment by misinformation.

Cool-headed, reasonable people have derived much satisfaction by watching the progress of recent events concerning the dispute between America and Spain. The United States is a powerful and an immensely rich country; Spain is comparatively weak and is poor. Nevertheless, so great is the dread of war now-a-days that week after week the President of the United States, though urged to immediate action by a raving Press, has postponed committing his country by a definitely expressed Message to Congress. Moreover, though a war between the United States and Spain would, less than any war between two other nations, disturb the interests of Europe, every European Government has strenuously endeavoured to bring about a peaceful solution of the dispute, and the Pope has exerted all his authority to secure the same end. It should be plain, from these facts, that no civilised nation would now welcome war, either between itself and another country or between two rival nations. Revolution is much more imminent than war, and many Sovereigns in Europe are keenly alive to this.

People might, with much advantage to themselves, occasionally turn their attention from that which is evil in humanity to that which is good. I have frequently been astonished by the number of gifts and bequests to charitable institutions which are announced almost every day in the newspapers, the announcements being, by the way, generally hidden in small type in the least prominent pages, whilst the "Horrible Murders," and "West End Scandals" are accorded the dignity of the largest lettering. I therefore marked during the last few days every announcement of the kind which I happened to notice, and as the gifts and bequests announced during this period are not more startling than usual it may be imagined that they represent the average donations to charitable institutions every fortnight:—

The late Miss Louisa da Costa bequeathed about...	£60,000
Mr. Alexander Peckover has given	4,000
Mr. Hope Morley has given	4,000
The late Mr. George Congreve bequeathed ...	500
The late Mr. Adam Teacher bequeathed	50,000
The late Mr. Hyam Beddington bequeathed about	6,000
The late Mr. John Shank bequeathed	650
An anonymous donor has given to Blackburn ...	13,000
Total	£138,150

Besides this, the late Mr. Teacher has bequeathed all his pictures to the Glasgow Corporation, and the late Mr. George Dennis has bequeathed his entomological collection to the Yorkshire Philosophical Society. It would be curious to learn even approximately how many millions are annually given and bequeathed for charitable purposes in Great Britain, and it cannot be doubted that if these generous endeavours to benefit the community continue sufficiently long, all our charitable institutions will one day be so effectively endowed as to be self-supporting.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THE utter rottenness and humbug of the Two Thousand and Derby betting is proved by the fatuous absurdities of last week in connection with Ninus and Brio. Prince Soltykoff's colt was made a warm favourite for the Newmarket race on the strength of his having won a trial, the fact being that he merely had a rough gallop with three platers over the R.M., and no sane creature would surely attach any serious importance to such a spin. Spur Royal would be a pretty sort of beast to try a Derby horse with. Wise people will be content to leave the Two Thousand alone until the day of running arrives, as the stamina of most of the probable starters is exceedingly doubtful, and probably there will be some genuine trials next week. It seems scarcely possible that Ninus will be thoroughly fit in a fortnight, and he will have most assuredly to "come on" with marvellous rapidity if he is to be sent to the post in proper racing condition. I see it is stated that Collar is to represent the Duke of Westminster, Batt being reserved for the Derby, but I believe this is a fiction. Batt is intended to run at Newmarket and at Epsom if well, while Collar will be kept for the Princess of Wales's Stakes of £10,000 at the Newmarket First July Meeting, when he will have the advantage of a maiden allowance, while the best of the other starters will have extra weight to carry. The demonstration in favour of Brio has been quite as preposterously idiotic as the rush on Ninus. I have several times predicted that Brio would be the best of the dark lot for the Two Thousand and Derby, and that he would be found a very smart animal, but did ever any one hear of more insane folly than the backing of a dark horse, who has not been tried in any conclusive fashion, at such a price as 11 to 2, while 100 to 8 was actually accepted about him for the Derby? It will be full time to back Brio when he has been galloped with a horse of real class. Dieudonné (as I long ago stated) is not likely to run before the Derby, but if either Jeddah, Carhaix, or Grodno can be galloped with Nunsuch to the satisfaction of their trainer, the winner of the trial ought to go very near to carrying off the Two Thousand. Jeddah will, no doubt, run for the Craven Stakes to-morrow, and he should win that race easily if he has any real pretensions to be a good horse. Grodno is a French-bred horse (by Gamin out of Georgina), owned by Lord William Beresford, who bought him as a yearling from M. Michel Ephrussi. Grodno was very backward when he ran last autumn, but he is a greatly improved colt, and has been going remarkably well in his gallops. He is in the Hardwicke Stakes at Ascot, and if he misses the classic events he might win that rich race, having a maiden allowance, and a very moderate lot of horses to meet.

If any one desired conclusive evidence that racing is at present outrageously overdone, it would be found in the fact that the Manchester Cup of £2,000, one of the richest handicaps of the season, has obtained only forty-one entries, while the Salford Borough Handicap, the principal mile race at the Whitsuntide meeting, has failed to fill. The Prince of Wales has entered Nunsuch for the Cup, a race which H.R.H. won three years ago with Florizel II. Nunsuch, who is a very smart mare, has been purchased by the Prince of Wales from Lord William Beresford, and this animal is certain to win a good handicap in the course of the season. The Duke of Devonshire has entered Glentilt and Carhaix, but the latter colt will probably be reserved for his weight-for-age engagements. St. Bris and Labrador are the Kingsclere representatives, and among the other notable animals entered are Piety, The Rush, Chiselhampton, Nouveau Riche, Laughing Girl, and Rapallo.

There is to be an end of the Stockbridge meeting, and the Bibury Club fixture will be transferred to Salisbury. After Goodwood, Stockbridge was the most enjoyable meeting of the year, but the proprietor of the famous downs objects to racing, and the manorial difficulties have proved insuperable. Of course, every one knows that Stockbridge has lost nearly all of its old importance of late years, and the Cup has no longer been the race it once was, although run over such a popular course as six furlongs. The two-year-old racing has always been the great feature at Stockbridge, and in this department the meeting has fairly well held its own, considering the comparatively small value of the stakes. Galtee More made a successful début two years ago in the Hurstbourne Stakes, a race which was originally established by John Day at the suggestion of that excellent sportsman and staunch patron of Stockbridge, the late Lord Portsmouth, whose death, indeed, was a blow to the meeting from which it never recovered, as that event put an end to the large annual party at Hurstbourne for the week. The disappearance of Stockbridge from the list of fixtures is the more to be regretted because the "going" was always good there, even in the most dry summer, and one never heard of animals returning home lame from this meeting. The Bibury Club was established in its present form about a hundred years ago, when the Prince of Wales (afterwards George IV.) was its patron, and most of the members of the Jockey Club belonged to it, besides a host of aristocratic sportsmen who were not habitués of Newmarket. The club races took place at Cheltenham for several years, but in 1831 the meeting was removed to Stockbridge, where it has ever since remained. Salisbury has direfully lost ground during the last few years, and the best plan will be to incorporate the Bibury Club Stakes with the present very weak programme of the meeting. It may be hoped that no attempt will be made to drag the Salisbury fixture over three days.

Mr. Leopold de Rothschild has lost his three-year-old filly Isabinda, own sister to St. Frusquin, and her death is a most unfortunate event, for, although she may not have achieved anything on the turf, yet she would have been of great value as a brood mare. A very high opinion was entertained of Isabinda when she was a yearling, and she was heavily engaged. It was determined to give the filly every chance, as she manifestly wanted time, so she was not trained as a two-year-old. It was hoped, however, that Isabinda would distinguish herself during the present season, and she was, therefore, left in for the £10,000 races and other "heavy" stakes, and at the time of her death she had upwards of twenty engagements, so that there will be several hundreds of pounds to pay on account of her forfeits. I have several times expressed the opinion that Isabinda would not stand training, and her failure was the more unfortunate inasmuch as she was a remarkably good-looking filly. I hope that Mr. Leopold de Rothschild will be compensated for the early collapse of St. Frusquin and the tragedy of Isabinda by the successes of St. Gris, their two-year-old half-brother, by Galopin. He is a fine racing-like colt, and acquitted himself very creditably in a gallop at Newmarket the other day, although still backward. If St. Gris does well during the next three weeks he will make its début in the Royal Plate of £3,000 at Kempton Park, on May 6. He is is in the Great Surrey Foal Plate of £1,200 at the Epsom Summer Meeting, but at Ascot he is entered for only the Windsor Castle Stakes on the last day.

I am sorry to hear that The Baker has gone amiss, and Sir John Kelk's colt is not at all likely to be in a condition to run at Ascot, which is much to be regretted, as his meeting with Galtee More and Cyllene would have produced one of the most interesting races of the season. The Baker is engaged in the Goodwood Cup, as also is Galtee More, but I fancy that he will not be seen out before Doncaster, at the earliest.

Prince Soltykoff has a smart two-year-old in Crucianella, by Gold out of Cross Wort, and she may be expected to win an "overnight" race at one of the Newmarket spring meetings. Crucianella has no engagement for several months, as she was unluckily struck out of the Sandown Park Stud Produce Stakes on the 22nd.

Geronte, a colt owned by the Comte de Berteux, who has been backed for the Derby, and was believed to be very smart, has met with an accident, and it is most probable that the last has been seen of him on the turf.

I understand that Hermiston (whose owner is in America) will be started for the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap, and if he wins that race he will run, four days later, for the Newmarket Stakes, an event which is likely to take more winning than the Two Thousand.

Mr. Rucker's racehorses, twenty-three in number, are to be sold at Newmarket to-morrow without reserve. Red Heart cost 5,100 gs. at the sale of Colonel North's stud in July, 1896, and he has since won three small races, value £851. That grievously mismanaged animal, Chit-Chat, has so far won nothing, although he has often enough been backed for important handicaps. Cupboard Love, by Saraband (3 yrs.), cost 250 gs. as a yearling, and she won the Tattersall Sale Stakes of £815 at Doncaster. Dunlop, who has won a single race, value £972, is the colt by Ayrshire out of Fortuna, for which Mr. Rucker was so infatuated as to give the Prince of Wales 5,000 gs. It will be interesting to see how much Dunlop fetches to-morrow. I do not believe the colt has the ghost of the shadow of a chance for the Derby, though he may win some T.Y.C. races. Dame Certain (3 yrs.), by Surefoot, cost 570 gs. as a yearling, and has never yet started for a race. Powderham (3 yrs.), by Hampton, cost 760 gs. as a yearling, and last season he ran once, without winning. Little Champion, (3 yrs.), by Hampton, cost 410 gs. as a yearling, and last season he started nine times, and won a single race, value £137. No two-year-old of last season was more assiduously written up in certain quarters than Royal Sport, by Royal Hampton, who, however, won nothing, although he ran three times. He cost 1,600 gs. as a yearling. The three-year-old, Rontgen Ray, by Prism, cost 670 gs. as a yearling, and last season he ran six times without winning. Roger de Coverley (3 yrs.), by Saraband, cost 490 gs. as a yearling, and he has never yet started. Slice of Luck (3 yrs.), by Bread Knife, cost 140 gs. as a yearling, and he ran four times last season, winning a single race, value £805. Lapwing II., an American-bred three-year-old, started eleven times last season, and won a single race, value £100. There are eight two-year-olds, but none of exceptionally "fashionable" breeding.

The Duke of Portland's three-year-old filly, Elizabeth Hardwicke, won her first race at Leicester, which was a five-furlong plate, value £103, a race which will not go far towards paying her last season's forfeits. Elizabeth Hardwicke was a good-looking yearling, and, being so grandly bred (half sister, by Orme, to Donovan), she would certainly have fetched at least 2,000 gs. if she had been offered for sale at that period of her career. The filly won her race very easily at Leicester, but she really had nothing to beat. I should fancy that she will soon be relegated to the stud, as she is never likely to accomplish much on the turf, but as a brood mare she may justifiably be expected to do well.

There will be racing next week at Epsom, Pontefract, and Sandown Park, but, except in one or two of the handicaps, the sport is not likely to be of much general interest.

The Westminster Plate at Epsom may be won by Mr. Cassel's April Fool, who has been well galloped, and she might very likely carry off the Hyde Park Plate also, as she would have no extra weight in the second race.

As to the City and Suburban, which will be practically a post-betting race, for nearly all the transactions which are laboriously recorded by the sporting papers are nonsense and rubbish, I have no fancy myself for Knight of the Thistle, who cannot stay the course, and he is one of the worst roarers in training. However, I understand that Knight of the Thistle is considered by Captain Machell to have an excellent chance of winning, and the field seems to be in a fair way to collapse. Chelandry has not been doing much work, and it was the same sort of slip-slop preparation which mainly caused her defeat for the Oaks. People who fancy Lord Rosebery's mare had better leave her alone until she is seen at the post. Kilcock cannot stay the course, and I should think it is very doubtful whether any of the money for which he has been backed has really come from this stable. Eager would be a good thing if the distance was a mile, but the last two hundred yards will probably stop him. Brayhead is thrown in, but he is not an easy horse for a boy to ride over such a course as Epsom. Brayhead on his best form is far and away the most favourably handicapped horse in the race, and if he got off well he might win in a canter. Lady Ernie would be a better candidate for her owner than Phœbus Apollo, but this horse is apparently intended to run at Epsom. Sandia will probably represent the American stable, Berzak being reserved for Kempton Park.

THE C.T.C. HANDBOOK TRICK.

It may be remembered that about this time last year I referred to the remarkable balance-sheet of the Cyclists' Touring Club. I said pretty plainly that there was no justification for raising the subscription from 3s. 6d. to 5s. The cycling press howled with indignation at my venturing to touch such a sacred institution as the C.T.C., and members wrote plaintive letters saying how hard-hearted I was to attack the club while their poor secretary was away ill. I have now to thank a member of the club for calling my attention to the following remarkable facts. I said, and I repeat, that an increase of membership would on none of the grounds stated be a reason for an increase of subscription. By a recent resolution of the Council every member of the club is to have gratis "The handbook and lodging list, which have hitherto been supplied at a cost of 2s." The secretary explains that "this altered condition of things is mainly attributable to the very satisfactory financial position of the club, but is also in part accounted for by the fact that a large percentage of members have in the past been innocent of a knowledge of the existence of these publications. . . . a condition of things the Council have resolved to remedy." My correspondent asks: "Could any body furnish a better justification of the hostile criticisms, or more completely stultify their original action?" I am glad that he, at all events, appreciates the justice of my comments; but I may point out that the original decision to increase the subscription was so utterly ridiculous that it needed no further stultification.

The whole suggestion of the gift of these books is that it is in the nature of a bonus, a present of a generous Council to innocent members. And very innocent the members must be if they can stomach the secretarial or editorial remarks, whose ever they be. Stripped of all verbiage this gift comes to one of two things, neither of which reflect any credit on the Council. I observe the books have been supplied at a cost of two shillings. In order to guard against any mistake, let me point out at once, that this may mean either that this is the net cost of publication, or that the price to members is two shillings, leaving a profit to the club. It may be doubted if even the C.T.C. would mulct its members of more than sixpence profit on these books. The conclusion therefore is that members have their subscription increased, and are then to get either the increase or more than the increase back in the shape of these books. If the financial position of the club allows this generous gift, then there was clearly no need for the subscription to be increased. Members who wished to buy the books would do so, and any profit out of the transaction would go to swell the club funds and reduce the club subscription. I note that the Farm House and Country Lodging list is already immensely popular with members. So says the flyleaf on which new members are cadged for. Thus the generous Council is going to give free books to those who have already purchased them. The club Gazette contains the following ingenuous remarks:—"In so deciding, they (the Council) have felt that they are placing in the hands of every subscriber the means whereby his membership may be made of the greatest possible value to him, and they are, at the same time, removing the prejudice from which the club has occasionally suffered in the past at the hands of those who were frequently ignorant of the existence of the publications referred to and who were in consequence innocent of the knowledge how to obtain any benefit from even the hotel appointments." I should have thought that so often as people were ignorant so often would the club suffer prejudice. But to meet an alleged occasional prejudice the club is to go to the enormous expense of circulating these precious books, which are so persistently advertised that it is difficult to believe that any one can be ignorant of their existence. Those who do not want them are to have them forced on them. Besides, these books are "immensely popular," so the fly-leaf says, and if this statement be true, why is the club going to give members what they have already purchased, and so deprive the club not only of a valuable property, but also put it to the expense of postage as well?

It would be impossible to believe that any council, or secretary, or editor, could be guilty of more flagrantly inconsistent statements over one simple fact—namely, the popularity of their books. In order to realise these misstatements clearly it is as well to bring them together. In the accounts it appears that the sales of the Handbook last year amounted to over £800. The lodging list is described as immensely popular, and yet the secretary asserts, according to my correspondent, that a large percentage of members are ignorant of these publications, while the Gazette announces that people are frequently ignorant of them. These statements are utterly irreconcileable. The conduct of this remarkable Council is quite inexplicable. My correspondent says, "Perhaps the innocence of members may be rather useful to the governing body." It seems to me that the Council and all the rest who run the C.T.C. know how to play the innocent card for its full worth and fairly bluff the simple-minded members. What follows in the editorial notes in the Gazette confirms this view. The editor says the Council in giving free handbooks in preference to cheaper road books were "beginning at the right end, seeing that the purchasers of road books are mainly the well-to-do section of the membership, whereas the Farm and Country Lodging List appeals especially to those to whom the expenditure of every extra shilling is a matter of some moment." Referring, then, to a letter of complaint, the editor proudly remarks: "We entirely deny that the C.T.C. has ever neglected the interests of the poorer member — the facts are quite to the contrary — and the latest decision of the Council is but the confirmation of the policy it has from first to last consistently followed." What blatant nonsense! The remark can only be true if the policy is one of blarney, bluff and bluster. How on earth can the poor man, to whom every shilling is of importance, be said to be considered when his subscription is increased to five shillings, and he is then given back books costing two shillings, whether he has already bought them, and whether he wants them, or not? Take a concrete case: One such book would do for several persons touring together. One would have bought it, and all would have paid the old subscription. Now all are mulct in five shillings, and get this precious gift. To say that the poor man is being considered is nothing more nor less than a gross misstatement of fact, which is not rendered any more palatable to the poor man by the fact that the club funds are being squandered in this noble effort to remove an occasional prejudice.

I am glad to learn that this action of the Council confirms their policy from first to last. It shows how singularly capable this body is, and how well competent it must be to manage a business involving the receipt and expenditure of enormous sums of money each year. I may note incidentally that, excluding a sick leave grant to the editor and secretary, Mr. Shipton, of £157 10s., salaries, &c., have increased by £1,100. This is one way of considering the poor man, I suppose. My correspondent says:—"Would not ordinary common sense have suggested a reduction of subscription, leaving those who wished for the handbook to purchase them?" Of course, common sense and decency would have suggested this course. But what can one expect from a Council which last year urged the need for an increase of subscription on the grounds, among other things, of the expense of posting the Gazette, and now goes to the expense of sending out-gratis these already immensely popular productions, which are unknown to a large percentage of the members.

These books, which are sent gratis, are filled with and accompanied by advertisements, and my correspondent naturally wants to know whether these publications are only advertising media, and further asks how far is a thing calling itself a club justified in using its members' money in order to force upon them undesired trade circulars? I should say that any "thing," which found a sufficient number of people asses enough to give five shillings for what they could get for three-and-sixpence, is quite justified in seeing what further burdens these patient animals will bear. Not only these books, but the Gazette itself appears to be very little better than an advertising medium, and from the statement of accounts it seems that some £650 has been paid to one or more persons last year by way of commission on advertisements. If the members of the C.T.C. like their business conducted in this way, and by a Council that acts in the extraordinary manner I have described, that is their affair. One can only hope that some day they will awaken to a true sense of the position of the club. If the club is to maintain the power and prestige which it asserts it has, it must really put its household in order, and condescend to conduct its affairs on common sense lines, otherwise it will fail to carry any weight or to deserve any esteem.

For Mosquito Bites nothing allays the irritation so quickly as Scrubb's Cloudy Fluid Ammonia, and it is an immediate remedy for Wasp or Bee Stings.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Good Friday.

My dear Ben,—According to what has now been my custom for a good many years, I take the opportunity of a quiet hour to-day to give you my impressions of the state of the Stock Markets, and their more immediate future. I write thus early as I hope to enjoy a brief holiday over Easter. So far holiday prospects promise well, and the members of the Stock Exchange and the public generally, not to forget the fagged-out journalists, will probably return to the scenes of their labours invigorated by sea and other breezes. What they will come back to precisely is the question, and more particularly whether there will be Peace or War?

It is a curious coincidence that Easter a year ago brought us an outbreak of war between Greece and Turkey. As in the case of the United States and Spain, there had been a long period of friction and of fears of war. Looking back upon the past year, one cannot help marvelling at the complete change which has come over the scene, and how pacific the sentiments of the then aggressor have become, while the three leading European Powers have actually to guarantee a loan in order to defray the indemnity due to Turkey. The relations between the two Powers which are now on the brink of war, viz., the United States and Spain, are of a somewhat different character to those which prevailed between Turkey and Greece, as in the present case the more powerful country (the United States) is the aggressor. There have been so many turns in the kaleidoscope of the Spanish-American dispute, that it is quite impossible to forecast the upshot. Just now the postponement of the delivery of President McKinley's message to Congress, and other circumstances, would appear to presage a settlement of the vexed Cuban question. There has, therefore, been a moderate rally in American Railroad stocks. More I do not wish to say, as I will append a post-scriptum on Tuesday morning, when it should be possible to see matters somewhat more clearly. In the meantime, the tension between the two countries has caused a further drain of gold to the United States, in view of which the Directors of the Bank of England put up the official minimum from 3 to 4 per cent. The Stock Exchange has received this movement very calmly, and general approval is expressed with the action of the Bank in thus protecting its gold reserve in case war should really break out. On the other hand, should peace, after all, remain undisturbed, the Bank would doubtless put down its rate again in a short time. A favourable feature, and one of the greatest importance, is, of course, the practical settlement of the Far Eastern question as far as the more immediate future is concerned, Mr. Balfour's statement in the House of Commons having created the impression that peace is now assured, which, in fact, I never doubted. Consols have naturally been affected by the war-scare and the rise in the Bank rate, and the quotation for the account has fallen to 111¼. Other high-class investments, too, have been a dull market, from British Corporation stocks to Colonial bonds and Home Railway Prefs., and will remain so until the war clouds lift. The Foreign department has naturally displayed great nervousness, and the fluctuations in Spanish have been particularly severe, ranging from 47¼ to 52. Should, at the eleventh hour, peace be concluded, Spanish bonds will doubtless recover to a moderate extent. But the large expense already incurred by that country for additional armaments must be a drag on it for a long time to come, while in case of war, Spanish bonds would probably experience another very severe tumble. Amongst the great European Powers which are now trying to find a solution for the Spanish-American trouble none has a greater interest in the maintenance of Spanish credit than France, as many millions have been placed by French investors in Spanish bonds. The actual outbreak of war would, therefore, have a very serious bearing upon the Spanish Paris Bourse. South Americans have been fairly steady, and are not likely to suffer much more from any adverse decision, while a settlement of the trouble would doubtless put them up. This also applies to South American and especially to Argentine Railway stocks. Home Rails are in such short supply, and there is so complete an absence of a speculative account, that they are not likely to decline to any extent; while, on the other hand, a peaceful settlement would give them a considerable lift. The very same position exists in the South African and West Australian mining sections. Both are, from the point of view of intrinsic merits, ready for an improvement. Politics in the Transvaal are mending, while the mines continue to yield large returns. In the case of the Westralian department the news from the Colony is excellent, and the accession of the Hon. E. H. Wittenoom, hitherto Minister of Mines in Western Australia, to the Agent-Generalship, will in a month or two doubtless exercise a beneficial effect upon this section. Home Industrial securities have not as yet suffered much from the depression, but it is more than ever necessary to use the utmost care in the selection of investments in this department, and with a view to providing some useful information to those of my readers who have for some time been clamouring for advice on really safe industrial investments, I am again publishing lists of debenture stocks, which should meet their requirements.

The Yield of Home Railways.

Since I wrote last on Home Railways, and pointed out the inconsistency of the market in putting down the stocks of Companies which are doing so remarkably well, a considerable rally has taken place. How far the same will extend in the immediate future must, of course, depend upon political influences, although I have very little doubt that, in a comparatively short time, the ordinary investment demand will reduce the available supply to such an extent that an improvement must follow. Under these circumstances, I have thoroughly gone into the question of the yields of the leading stocks, and herewith present my readers with a table, giving not only the fluctuations in the present year, but also the dividends paid in 1897, and the yield per cent. per annum :—

Traffic returns for the week ending April 2 show a distinct improvement, one of the best returns being that of the Midland with an increase of £10,238, the North Western following with an increase of £5,871. The Great Northern is also doing well, and the Great Central gain of £2,026 is distinctly encouraging, as is also the Caledonian return, which showed an increase of £2,379. If I intended to make an investment to-day, I should single out Dover "A," Caledonian Deferred Ordinary (Coras), and Brighton "A," and if I wanted a lock up I should select Great Central 1894 Ordinary stock and Metropolitan Districts, not to forget Central London Railway fully-paid Ordinary, which are now to be obtained at a somewhat lower price.

Yankee Rails—On the Brink of War.

I am almost reminded by this head-line of the naturalist who, in his chapter on "Snakes in Iceland," vouchsafed the information "there are no snakes in Iceland." Not that I wish to imply that there are no Yankee Rails, but there is no Yankee market at present, and I cannot advise on Yankee Rails without knowing whether there will be peace or war, and thus the few remarks which I am about to make must be entirely of a hypothetical description. If the United States go to war with Spain there will, doubtless, be a temporary decline, which will, however, probably be recovered again, and followed by an improvement, although much will depend upon the result of any naval engagement that may happen in the early course of the war. If President McKinley further postpones his much-discussed Message, if the European Powers succeed in smoothing the way towards a settlement, there will be a smart rise, although necessarily some time must elapse before peace is absolutely certain, and thus the mercurial Yankee Market will for a time be at the mercy of the unscrupulous operators with Washington connections, who are ever in early possession of political news, and thus are able to get the best of the gamble. If a return could be obtained of the number of shares which have been bought and sold by American senators and their friends during the recent period of political uncertainty, I think that some extraordinary figures would be disclosed. My devout wish is that these speculative politicians should in the end be floored. With reference to Canadian Railroads it is quite touching to find how pacific the pronouncements of the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk directors are with reference to the war of rates. One would think that these excellent personages were all very ill-used, if the statements of one board were not absolutely traversed by statements of the other. The upshot of the Grand Trunk meeting appears to me to be that, while prospects generally are excellent, an increase in the working expenses will have to be faced. Both the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific would undoubtedly benefit by a Spanish-American war, as very large quantities of goods would be diverted from United States roads to these systems. But even if peace should be maintained, both are likely to remain on the road to prosperity, and I fully anticipate in that case a further advance in Canadian Pacifics and in the higher-class Grand Trunk junior securities.

The South American Market.

South American Government stocks have suffered, with the rest of the markets, from the plethora of war scares which has been inflicted upon us. As a consequence, a well-justified advance, which had been on the tapis, has in many cases been prevented, and reactions have, on the contrary, been the order of the day. This circumstance is brought home to one more particularly when looking at recent movements of Argentine Government stocks. It is true that there has again been some friction with Chili over the boundary question, but it is most unlikely that this will lead to fighting, and in the meantime the yield of the various securities, on the basis of the resumption of the full service of the debt, are attractive for investment. It had been anticipated that a unification scheme would be issued ere this, but for that we have evidently to wait until the old rates of interest have been fully restored. I give herewith a list of the chief Argentine Government stocks, with the highest and lowest prices touched during 1897, and the present quotations and yield on the basis of the full interest :—

Loans.	Highest. in 1897.	Lowest	Price April 7, 1898.	Yield per Cent. per annum.
Argentine 5 p.c. 1886-7	96¾	77½	88½	5 12 4
Do. 5 p.c. Waterworks	73⅜	61⅛	68¾	7 2 10
Do. 6 p.c. Funding	90⅞	77¾	86¾	6 15 6
Do. 6 p.c. Railway 1881	88½	69	87½	6 16 1
Argentine 5 p.c. 1884	66¼	53¾	67	7 9 3
Do. 5 p.c. N.C. Railway	67⅛	53¾	66	7 11 6
Do. 5 p.c. Treasury Conversion 1887	67¼	54	66xd	7 9 3
Do. Rly. 4 p.c. Guar. Rescission	64	54	56½	7 0 6
Do. 4½ p.c. Internal	63	50⅛	65	6 18 5
Do. 4½ p.c. Sterling	64	52	65	—
Do. 3½ p.c. External.....	48½	39	48	7 5 10

From this comparative statement it will be gathered that the 1886 Loan gives the lowest yield, as the resumption of the full service in this case has already been discounted. In the other stocks a yield of from 6¾ to 7½ per cent. can be obtained, although a great deal depends upon the nature of the scheme under which the unification of the various loans is to be carried out. Crop prospects in Argentina are favourable, and it is very generally hoped that the accession of General Costa to the Presidency may bring back the good times which the Argentine Republic enjoyed when that statesman was once before their President. That he will do his very best to safeguard the financial position need not be doubted; but even he cannot guarantee the non-appearance of war scares such as have of late demoralised our markets. The fact that the Buenos Ayres gold premium remains at a comparatively low level—viz., 165, is, of course, encouraging. The strongest group in the South American department has been that of Uruguay bonds, the New Loan being quoted 55½, the Old Loan 45¼. This means that the Three and a Half per Cent. bonds still yield over 7½ per cent. per annum on the investment, while the new Five per Cent. bonds would pay about 8⅞ per cent. per annum on present price. President Cuestas appears to have control of the political position, and will doubtless be re-elected President at the next elections. Unless any adverse accidents occur, therefore, it may be presumed that this able and honest statesman will put Uruguayan finance thoroughly on its feet again. Chilian bonds are still at a low level, the 1892 Loan being quoted 84, the 1886 Loan 75. It is not, of course, forgotten that this Republic has always scrupulously fulfilled its obligations, and was at one time the only honest South American nation; but recent monetary legislation was evidently unwise, and the depreciation in nitrate of soda has been a severe blow to Chili. I wonder how much further the Rio exchange will fall? It now stands at 5d., and this disastrous quotation must entail great sacrifices upon Brazil. The April interest has been paid, but people are beginning to ask whether this sort of thing can go on. It was undoubtedly a faux pas on the part of the Brazilian Government not to have parted with the Brazilian Central Railway when a syndicate of financiers made an offer of £5,000,000 for the lease. I doubt whether anything like this sum could now be obtained, and in the meantime the 1889 Loan has dropped to 48¾, Western of Minas to 50. Of all the Spanish Republics, Mexico is apparently doing the best under the wise government of President Diaz. Railway traffics show increases, and not only the agricultural resources, but also the mineral riches, of the country are being judiciously developed. The only dark spot in the future of Mexico would seem to be the loss of President Diaz, which she must sooner or later experience, for it will be difficult to find a successor who has an equal hold upon the people, and is, at the same time, so wise and judicious in the legislation initiated by him.

Argentine Railway Stocks.

The position of Argentine Railway securities is fraught with considerable interest at present, as an important improvement which took place in the early part of the present year, owing to a speculative movement, has practically been wiped out again. It is quite true that there was a solid basis for a rise in most of these stocks, as the crops promised a good yield both as regards wheat and the wool clip. But speculators had gone too far in advance of the traffics, and it is only now that the returns begin to show a considerable increase. The following is a comparison of the traffics of the four leading unguaranteed lines during the last three months, as compared with the same period last year :—

	Gross traffics from Jan. 1 to April 6. 1898.	1897.	Increase.
Buenos Ayres Great Southern ...	£490,653	£454,892	£35,761
Central Argentine ...	293,475	220,151	73,324
Buenos Ayres & Rosario	229,614	168,300	61,314
Buenos Ayres Western ...	182,925	195,900	*12,975

* Decrease.

It will be seen that the Central Argentine and Buenos Ayres and Rosario are showing the largest increases; but of course these were also the lines which were most in need of an improvement of traffics, as they had done badly during the year 1897. In that year the Buenos Ayres and Rosario paid 2 per cent. against 3 per cent. for 1896, while the Central Argentine has just announced a dividend of 1¾ per cent., against 2¼ per cent. in 1896. The Buenos Ayres Great Southern, on the other hand, was able to pay a dividend at the rate of 5½ per cent. for the half-year ended December 31, 1897, as against 5 per cent. for the corresponding half of 1896. This line, in fact, experienced the effect of the improvement sooner than the others. The Directors' report just issued of the Buenos Ayres Great Southern shows gross receipts £680,895, against £637,429 for the corresponding half-year of 1896. Owing to an increase in the working expenses, the net profit shows a much smaller increase, viz., £391,948, against £382,099 in 1896. After payment of Debenture and Preference interest, a disposable balance of £257,471 remains, from which the above-mentioned dividend is paid. As usual, this report presents a good deal of interest. Mr. White, the Chairman of the Local Committee, after referring to the total loss of the wheat and maize crops, now reports that prospects have improved, and that rains came in time to assure a good if not a large crop, which is now being secured. The law making the destruction of locusts by landowners compulsory is stated to have worked fairly. The following paragraph sums up other promising points :—

The commercial depression had an evident effect on imports, limiting these considerably, but the general confidence which exists as to the future is reflected both in exchange and the appreciation of the paper dollar. The high rate of the former is causing importation of gold, and over a million sovereigns have been received from England. The fall in the quotation of the gold premium was at one time so rapid as to bring about a fear that financial complications might arise on that score; this, however, should not occur to any serious extent if the anticipated progress and improvement become a fact. With the return of confidence, which has been assisted by the prospects of peace and tranquility in both home and foreign politics, the political situation is more settled, and the prospects of business more hopeful than has been the case for many years, which should tend to encourage an influx of immigration and capital. An improvement in the value of real estate has already become apparent.

It is to be hoped that the ill-advised agitation concerning the boundary dispute with Chili will not spoil the pleasant prospects. Measures are, of course, announced by the Buenos Ayres Great Southern for making the necessary issue of capital for the purpose of taking over the property of the Buenos Ayres and Ensenada Port Railway. The Buenos Ayres Western still shows decreases, and for the half-year ended December 31, 1897, it paid a dividend at the rate of only 3½ per cent. per annum. The unfavourable result is due to the injury done to the maize crop by locusts. In order to show the course of quotations during 1897 and in the present year, I have compiled a table of some of the leading stocks:—

—	1897. Highest.	1897. Lowest.	1898. Highest.	Present Quotations.
Buenos Ayres Great Southern	150¼	128½	158¼	147
Buenos Ayres Western	12⅜	10⅞	12 5/16	10¾xd
Central Argentine Ordinary...	87	67½	87½	77
Buenos Ayres and Rosario ...	80	59½	79	70½
Cordoba and Rosario First Debenture stock	99½	91½	98¾	91
Ditto Six per Cent. (Second Debenture stock)	100	81	92	83
Cordoba Central First Prefs.	98½	90	95½	83½
Cordoba Central (Central Northern Section)	102⅜	91	95½	87½
Ditto Income Debenture stock	76⅜	56¼	62	45½
Bahia Blanca and North-Western Prefs.....	54½	43	65	53½

Prices, it will be seen, are from 8 to 14 points below the quotations of two months ago, when the large "Bull" speculation to which I have referred was in full swing, and when I uttered a word of caution as to the reckless manner in which prices were being pushed up in advance of the improvement in earnings. The depression has since been deepened by the declaration of the unsatisfactory dividend announcement of the Central Argentine, and by the war scares, which have also had their effect in this section. The fall has, however, been so considerable that a rally would be fully justified, especially in case the war-clouds should lift, and while on the basis of last year's dividends the yields cannot be said as yet to be satisfactory, the traffic increases on three of the above-mentioned leading lines promise better returns for the current year. This does not, however, apply to all the lines, and unfortunately continued traffic decreases are, for instance, still shown in the case of the Cordoba Central. The aggregate receipts of the original line since January 1 amounted to $240,700, against $279,600 last year, a decrease of $38,900. The Central Northern Section of the same Company has done even worse, as the aggregate receipts from January 1 were only $484,290, against $668,430 for the same period of last year, a decrease of $184,140. The poorness of the traffics is due chiefly to the collapse in sugar, and so far there is not much daylight to be seen yet, although one of these days, whenever traffics assume normal proportions, Central Northern Section Income Debenture stock will probably experience a sharp improvement.

The Mining Markets.—Firm and Hopeful.

The week has been so short, consisting as it did of only four working days, and the business of the various sections of the Mining Market has been so overshadowed by politics and fears of the outbreak of war between the United States and Spain that I need touch but briefly on Mining shares. The outlook in the Kaffir Circus is distinctly improved, and at one time better prices were current, but the prevailing uncertainty and rumours of war have caused a reaction. In the Transvaal, however, political prospects are improving, and there are those who expect that Oom Paul will become quite amiable presently. At all events, he has no longer the hope to rely upon that this country may be drawn into a great European war, latest developments in China pointing to amicable relations with Russia and France. It is also a sign of the times that Sir Alfred Milner has been so well received in the Free State, and that President Steyn expressed the view that the tension existing in South Africa was abating. When once the political outlook brightens, therefore, we shall doubtless see a general rally. In the meantime, we have Rand Mines, Limited, at 29⅜, Consolidated Goldfields at 4 3/16, East Rands at 4 5/16, after considerably higher quotations had been touched. Whenever a more lasting improvement comes about, Randfontein may be expected to go ahead; and I also look for a sharp rise in Barnato Consols. Amongst the Deep Level propositions, I am still in favour of Goldfields Deep, now quoted at 8⅝. The annual report of the Simmer and Jack will, I hear, show a very satisfactory position. The Company will be found to owe £308,000 in debentures, being the balance of the original issue of £500,000, and against this it has cash in Johannesburg £60,000, debtors in London and Johannesburg (being for the most part cash actually in hand) £330,000, gold in transit not credited at December 31, 1897, £19,000, and 93,070 shares in the Rand Victoria Mines with the right to take up over 40,000 more shares at £2. The available assets are, therefore, far in excess of liabilities. The actual profit earned in the past year of £82,030 is not perhaps brilliant, but this is explained by the difficulties connected with the starting of a new mill. The results obtained by the Geldenhuis Deep in the year 1897 also furnish proof of the possibilities of Deep Level mining. But of this more anon. With reference to the melancholy death of Mr. Woolf Joel, it is now stated that the body will reach England by the Dunottar Castle, which is due at Plymouth by the end of next week. The interment at Willesden Cemetery is expected to take place on the 17th or 18th inst., but a definite announcement is expected this week. The West Australian department is showing extreme dulness, operators having almost completely retired from doing business until the political clouds have rolled by. The London and Globe group has, upon the whole, been firm; but Lake View Consols are easier at 9 1/16, while Ivanhoe stand at 5. The shares in the parent Company have been well supported at 1⅝. West Australian Goldfields have been steady at 1⅝, and Hampton Plains have maintained their improvement to ⅞. From the Lady Shenton Mine another excellent crushing has been announced, viz., 900 oz. of gold from 300 tons of ore, this result having been obtained in ten days. The total crushings now amount to 28,052 oz. of gold from 8,043 tons of ore—truly a gratifying result; and the moment normal political conditions prevail, I look for a sharp advance on the present price of 2 7/16. A detailed mail report, dated February 18, from the manager, Mr. J. W. Rayfield, has just been posted to all the shareholders. It is so complete and of so satisfactory a character that I have nothing to add to it, especially as the cablegrams since received report yet more favourable developments. It is stated that the clean-up for the excellent yield of 900 oz. was for ten days only on account of the annual balance on March 31. The West Australian Market Trust group has been dull, chiefly owing to the adverse political outlook and warlike rumours; but a change in these shares generally comes about very quickly. The following is the list of crushings for the week:—

	Tons of Ore Crushed.	Oz. of Gold.	Assay of Tailings Per Ton.
Lady Shenton	300	900	—
North Boulder	373	329	—
Mount Malcolm Prop.	660	520	7 dwt.
Menzies Gold Reefs	68	82	14 dwt.
Champion Extended and Home Rule	900	630	5½ dwt.
Sons of Gwalia	990	1,241	28 dwts.
Cuddingwarra G M.	227	208	—
Northern Territories "Eureka"	1,200	887	—
Great Boulder Perseverance	247	894	—
" " "	770	807	—
Mount Yagahong	1,060	914	—
Sherlaw's	180	149	—

Hannan's Brownhill have been a firm market at 7½, and Sons of Gwalia continue to be dealt in at 2⅛. The above-mentioned crushing of the Sons of Gwalia is very satisfactory, and the total returns to date are now 4,850 tons of ore crushed for 6,163 oz. of gold, the tailings assaying 29 dwts. In the Indian section dealings have been on a moderate scale, the feature being an improvement in Nundydroog; while amongst others Ooregum, Mysore Wynaad, and Mysore West have been flat. New Zealand mines are still out of favour, and business has been reduced to a minimum. In British Columbian shares active dealings have taken place in London and British Columbian Goldfields and in Whitewater Mines. There has also been some inquiry for Klondike and British Columbian Goldfields. British Columbia Development and Tangier have improved, but Hall Mines, Fairview, Waverley, and War Eagle are all slightly easier. British America Corporation shares have been steady at 20s. to 20s. 6d. The last crushing of the Consolidated Goldfields of Mexico is announced as follows:—"During March (working twenty-nine days) cleaned up £3,564; treated 2,040 tons; average gross value, £2 18s. 6d.; profit for month, £1,033, exclusive of tailings averaging £1 3s. 7d. per ton." It is understood that the cyanide plant is not yet showing the percentage of extraction which it will after working a month or two longer. Moreover, only 2,040 tons were crushed for the month, while the full capacity of the mill is 3,000 tons, which will shortly be reached. The extraction by cyanide for February was 51 per cent., while for March it is 66¼ per cent., and the manager hopes that the April or May extraction will be increased to about 80 per cent., which is about the average of the numerous tests made some months ago. If these anticipations are fulfilled, the monthly net profits would be brought up to something like £6,000 per month, or £72,000 per annum, which would be a very handsome return, apart from the many other valuable properties of the Company which will in due time be floated into subsidiary companies. At anything like par, therefore, these shares are a good purchase.

My Letter Box.

If my correspondents do not find answers to all their communications in the present issue, they must put this down to the holiday time, of which I am trying to avail myself, and those letters which have not been replied to in the current number will be duly attended to in next week's Truth. As several of my conditions are not adhered to by many of my correspondents, I take this opportunity of reminding them that I can only reply to communications which are accompanied by the names and addresses of the writers, not, of course, for publication, but as a token of good faith. All anonymous letters will be consigned to the waste-paper basket. Some delay must necessarily occur in answering questions which entail special inquiries, and it is, as a rule, not possible to attend in the current issues to communications which arrive after Friday. My correspondents will also greatly simplify my task by reading my weekly letters carefully through, as these frequently contain remarks on the very subject on which information is sought. Their letters should also be plainly written, and to the point, and it is necessary that the different stocks or shares on which information is asked should be numbered. I again repeat that I can accept no fees for my replies in my "Letter Box," and that I cannot undertake to answer by letter or telegram. I must also absolutely decline to execute any orders for stocks or shares, or to act as an intermediary in any way. The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

R. P. N.—Yes, the outlook in Uruguay is extremely favourable, and the bonds are a good investment at the price. S. S.—I see no reason why you should not invest in Argentine Funding bonds, although you must be prepared to face some fluctuations. Rover.—You will find the yields of the various Argentine Government stocks given in to-day's letter, and the information supplied about Argentine Railways will answer the rest of your inquiries. Conister.—I see no reason why you should not exchange into Uruguay Three and a Half per Cent. bonds.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

S. A. V.—One of those outside touts who are springing up again Have nothing to do with him. H. B., Streatham.—A third-class life office. I always recommend my readers to insure with first-rate institutions. H. C. A.—I strongly advise you to have nothing to do with Sandford & Co.'s so-called "individual accounts—a safe system of successful stock operations," which is merely a revival of the syndicate deals. It would be interesting to know where Sandford & Co. "acquired their experience extending over a long period." It is distinctly precious that Sandford & Co. warn their clients against the "so-called pools and syndicates." That really reminds one of "pots calling kettles black." F. J. H.—What you require has been forwarded in your envelope. Sam.—If you forward a stamped and addressed envelope I may be able to comply with your request.

Home Rails.

X. A. E. K.—No, I do not think that there is any advantage in the splitting of these shares. The fully-paid shares are the best from the investor's point of view. B. N.—No, I should not feel inclined to sell Dover "A" now. Bristol Reader.—Certainly; as a lock-up Metropolitan Districts are difficult to beat amongst the low-priced stocks.

American and Foreign Rails.

T. F.—The article on Argentine Railway stocks in another column will no doubt assist you in your selection. Stuart.—The Seven per Cent. "A" Debenture stock of the Inter-Oceanic of Mexico is at present quoted 67, ditto "B" Debenture stock 31, the Four per Cent. Debenture stock 84. You can thus easily arrive at the values. Blanca.—You can make your selection from the Argentine Railway stocks referred to in my letter. The strongest company is undoubtedly the Buenos Ayres Great Southern. Z.—American Rails are already at war level, and there is no reason why you should not buy Louisville or Union Pacific Prefs., as long as you can take them up and pay for them. Geneva.—1. I think that the Brazilian Rails had better be held now. 2. No doubt eventually some settlement will be come to with reference to this Argentine Railway.

Mining Shares.

Nickel.—1 and 2. There is every prospect of an improvement in these mining shares, but as to actual safety you cannot speak of that in connection with such undertakings. The shares A are at a very low price at present, and should advance. B are also a fair mining risk of the New Zealand class, and C look promising. Mugwump.—This is not the time to sell any of the mining shares Nos. 1 to 16, as a recovery of some kind is probable. Many of these have been bought against my advice, but I should think that at all events Nos. 1, 4, 12, and 13 should come right, while as regards the others there is still hope. W. C. S., Attareen.—There is no option but to hold for the present. Lamp.—I am afraid you were too late with your selling order. Such fluctuations are not at all surprising, and there is no option but to hold. Archie.—The mine has been a disappointing one, but there is still hope that it may turn out all right. At the same time, I have not sufficient information in my possession to advise a further purchase as yet. Rona.—The Ivanhoe (1) is a good Company, and the shares are likely to improve upon the present price of 5⅛. The Lake View Consols (2) is also doing well, and the shares are likely to rise. The Lady Shenton (3) is capitalised at a very low figure, and is certainly exceedingly promising. With regard to the other contents of your letter, I can only say that comparisons are odious. Baronrath.—It is always advisable not to place too many eggs into one basket, and under these circumstances, Florence appear to be more suitable for a purchase. Prue and Kernigy.—You will have found a reply from the Secretary of the Lady Shenton Company in the issue of April 5 of the same contemporary, which fully explains the position. Broussa.—You should not take any notice of such letters. The Lady Shenton is doing remarkably well, as you will see from the last crushing which goes 3 oz. to the ton. Hold, and buy more, if you can afford to do so. You will have noticed the Company's reply on Tuesday. Maiden City.—1. There has unfortunately been grave mismanagement, and the Company is not doing well. 2. I do not exactly say that this is a fraud, but results are certainly very disappointing. 3. Chiefly in sympathy with the general depression. C. C. W.—1. I cannot alter my opinion of the mine in question. 2. The cycle shares are a fair purchase. 3. I should not sell Bovril Deferred now. B. D. D.—You will have seen in the issue of the 5th inst. of the same newspaper a complete refutation of these allegations, and to that I must refer you. Your eyes ought indeed to be opened now. Randfontein and Sheba are a good purchase at present. A. Y.—I should think that your purchases of London and Globe and Florence will come all right, and you may certainly hold Nos. 1 to 3. I do not think you will be disappointed if, as you propose, you select Lady Shenton. Montpelier.—You can only be a holder of shares. I do not think it advisable to throw good money after bad. Bredos.—I really cannot give an opinion on the matter without receiving further particulars; but if you are still on the list of shareholders, you are no doubt liable. Buffelsdoorn.—I think you had better await further developments before buying more. Anonymous.—I do not usually answer anonymous letters, and you can obtain the information you require from the secretary of the Peak Hill Goldfields.

INDUSTRIAL SHARES.

Bidwell.—The £1 shares of the European Petroleum Company stand nominally at $\frac{1}{2}$—$\frac{3}{4}$. F. P.—Yes, the Five and a Half per Cent. Preference shares of J. & J. Yardley & Company are a good purchase at their present price of $4\frac{3}{4}$ to 5. Anglo-Indian.—1. Both newspaper investments seem to be equally good. 2. The premium is a high one, and I do not advise the purchase. Land.—1. There is no market for these shares yet, and I do not hold a favourable opinion of the undertaking. 2. The general depression in the Cycle market; do not buy yet. W. F.—1. No; I do not advise a sale of these shares, as the Company is doing well. 2. Possibly. 3. High enough.

MIXED INVESTMENTS.

R. D. N.—You have done well to buy Dover "A," Great Eastern, and Union Pacific Ordinary and Prefs. at the prices named, and if you take these up and hold them for some time, you will doubtless see a good profit. Remotus.—No reason to sell either No. 1 or 2. Chartered (4) are on the up-grade again, and there is not much fear of No. 5 declining. No. 3 should be held for a recovery. I cannot reply by letter.

A CHAPTER ON THE INDUSTRIAL MARKET.

I have again received a number of inquiries from readers who wish to make selections of Home Industrial Debentures, which they consider at present the safest form of investment when a certain yield has to be obtained. There are, in the first instance, first-class Home Brewery debentures, and I have compiled a little list of about a dozen of such stocks, from which a selection can easily be made:—

HOME BREWERY DEBENTURES.

Description.	Int'rest per cent.	Present Price.	Yield. £.	s.	d.
Courage & Co. Debenture Stock	4	126	3	3	6
Bristol Brewery Debenture Stock (Georges & Co.)	4	115½	3	9	6
Smith, Garrett, & Co.'s 1st Mort. Deben. Stock	3¾	107 xd	3	10	0
Parker's Burslem 1st Mortgage Debenture Stock	4	111	3	12	0
Eadie, James, Irredeemable 1st Mort. Deben. Stock	4	106	3	15	6
Allsopp, S., & Sons, Debenture Stock	4½	118	3	16	3
Yardley, J. & J., & Co., First Mortgage Debenture Stock	4¼	103	4	2	6
Northampton Brewery Debenture Stock	5	126	3	19	3
Guinness, Arthur, & Co.'s Debenture Stock	5	122	4	1	9
Wolverhampton and Dudley Redeemable Debentures	4½	108	4	3	3
Buckley's Redeemable Debenture Stock	4½	105½	4	5	9
Watney & Co.'s Debenture Stock	5	115½	4	6	9

Quotations have during the last few months given way to the extent of from 1 to 3 points, and there is nothing in the immediate future of the brewery industry to indicate reduced profits. Of course, should the Bank rate be raised again there may be a further easing-off in prices, even of the best. Any one, on the other hand, who would like to make a selection of Home Brewery Preference stocks, can compile a little private trust from the following list:—Buckley's Brewery Five and a Quarter per Cent. Cumulative Preference at 10¾ xd.; City of London Brewery Five per Cent. Cumulative Preference stock at 137; Manchester Brewery Seven per Cent. Cumulative Preference at 17; Northampton Brewery Six per Cent. Preference at 12½ xd.; Stretton's Derby Brewery Six per Cent. Cumulative Preference at 13¼; and J. & J. Yardley & Co.'s Five and a Half per Cent. Cumulative Preference at 4¾ to 5. Coming to other Home Industrial debentures I herewith give a list of well-secured debentures from which a suitable selection could easily be made up:—

I may mention that in the majority of cases the present quotations show declines of from 1 to 2 points against the values at the commencement of the year, although in some instances, viz., Peebles, Waring, Schweppe, Lyons, and Gordon Hotels, advances are marked. Turning from these purely investment securities to the market in the more speculative Ordinary stocks of industrial enterprises, I have to record a considerable business in Liptons, the Ordinary being somewhat firmer at $\frac{7}{8}$-1 premium, the Prefs. at $\frac{1}{8}$-$\frac{3}{16}$ premium. If current rumour is to be credited, the Lipton Company is also going to distinguish itself by obtaining a very speedy Stock Exchange settlement, and this in contrast with the scandalous delay which prevails in connection with other Companies, is, apart from all other considerations, likely to make the shares popular in the market. It is reported that the Vi-Cocoa people are about to rival Lipton, Limited, in this laudable endeavour to save time. The Delagoa Bay arbitration is at last drawing to a close, and to judge from the quotations which are now being made by the jobbers, a more hopeful view is taken of a decision favourable to the Company. Oil shares have on the whole been firmer, Russian Petroleum having risen to 22½, Schibaieff to $\frac{3}{16}$-$\frac{1}{4}$ premium. Fish Oil shares, on the other hand, have not been benefited by the meeting held in Dublin on Tuesday, and the price is now lower at 6¾, which is a very different figure from that which prevailed a few months ago when the boom was on. Threads (English Sewing Cotton) remain dull at $\frac{9}{16}$ premium, while Coats Ordinary have declined to 60½. Hardly any business is passing in Welsbach Incandescents, the Ordinary being quoted 111, the Preference 99½, the Deferred 19s. 6d. Bovril Ordinary are quoted $\frac{7}{8}$-1, while the Deferred are inactive at $\frac{5}{8}$. Schweppe Deferred at $\frac{9}{16}$ are neglected, while the Ordinary are dull at $1\frac{3}{16}$. There is no inclination to deal in Hudson's Bay shares or in Anglo "A" until the American outlook is clearer. Cycle shares have been inactive owing to the holiday influences, but prices are pretty well maintained in most instances, with the exception chiefly of Dunlop Ordinary, which fell heavily to 11s., on the result of the Fleuss case, and the resignation of the Duke of Somerset from the Board. Elswick Prefs. have improved to $\frac{9}{16}$,

Rovers to 14s. 3d. Swifts at 11s. 3d., and Singers at 11s. are the turn firmer, while Cycle Components have hardened to 1⅜. A decline in Amalgamated Tyres to 6s. 3d. has taken place, and Raglan are maintained at 12s. 6d. Salt Union Ordinary stand at 1⅝, the Prefs. at 5¾, and I am wondering whether the measures which are being taken by the shareholders' committee will lead to any improvement in this concern, which I condemned from the outset as a hopeless attempt at a monopoly. The committee are now proposing to infuse new blood into the board by the election of five leading Liverpool men, who certainly appear to have good business capacity. Worse management than the Company has had can hardly be imagined, and it remains now to be seen whether the new Directors will be able to place the concern on its legs again. Spiers & Pond shares have improved to 21½xd, apparently on some hopeful view being entertained of the Company's "tea and toast" departure. Paquin shares have been steady at ⅞ to 1⅛, and the Directors score a point by their statement that, in spite of the Paris fire and the prohibitive American tariffs, they have made a profit of about £60,000, as compared with £46,000 before the present Company took over the concern.—Your affectionate Uncle,

MOSES.

P.S., Tuesday Morning.—The budget of news which has come to hand over the holidays is of a varied description, but there is no very bad point. The fact that an armistice has been granted by Spain in Cuba is neutralised by President McKinley's Message, which is certain to give offence to Spain, and places the decision as to armed intervention in the hands of Congress, the majority of which is bellicose. The best that can be said is that peace between the United States and Spain may still be preserved. The news from South Africa is favourable The Witwatersrand output for March shows well with 325,907 oz., against 297,975 oz. in February, and 232,067 oz. in March, 1897. At the time of writing the figures for the outside districts have not yet come to hand. The news concerning the Far East is very pacific, and should a settlement of the Spanish-American question be possible, the political horizon would practically be clear, especially as the attitude of Germany towards this country is much more amicable. The brilliant victory in the Soudan is, of course, an excellent piece of news, which should exercise a favourable influence in many ways.

QUEER STORY.

THE PLAIN CONFESSION OF A PLAIN GIRL.

I AM a very ordinary girl, with a plain face and no particular compensating advantages. I cannot sing or play; I have no skill with brush or pencil; my conversation is neither brilliant nor witty; I am not even sociable. I like to keep myself to myself, and to those few—very few—whom I happen to like. As a natural consequence, I am—I will not say unpopular (because I have never been of sufficient consequence for that)—but simply neglected and ignored in the social sphere in which I move. And when my acquaintances give me a thought at all—which is surely very seldom—they probably think of me simply as a taciturn and morose young person, whose friendship is by no means worth the trouble of going out of the way to seek.

My young sister, Phyllis, who lives with me, occupies quite another position. Everybody likes Phyllis. They cannot help liking her; for she is as friendly and open-hearted as I am self-contained and reserved. And she is pretty, too, and graceful, and accomplished. Half the young fellows in the place are in love with her. Indeed, she has had five offers already, though she is not yet eighteen. She has declined all five. And I think I know why. It is an old story. There is some one else.

Rupert Denison is often at our house. That he loves Phyllis is quite certain; and that Phyllis loves him is equally beyond doubt. I am expecting, after every visit he pays us, to hear from Phyllis that he has spoken, and been accepted. I always make an opportunity for leaving them alone together. But hitherto he has not taken advantage of his chances. I almost wonder that he is so long. But Rupert is shy, and diffident of himself. I do not think he at all realises what a dear, fascinating fellow he is. However, it must come soon now—very soon. And Phyllis will be the happiest girl in the county.

We live alone together, Phyllis and I, in a small house, and a small way. I stand in the place of a mother to my little sister. I am twenty-four, but I feel forty; and I think I must look more. I shall certainly never marry. I do not suppose that I shall ever have an offer. Perhaps, if people knew——. But this is exactly what my dear old father wished to save me from. And, may-be, he was wise and right; although I do not think that I should have been easily deceived by the feigned sentiments of any lover of—my money.

My money? Oh yes! I have money. Plenty. More than I know what to do with. But no one is aware of this—except my solicitors, a London firm, and my bankers, a London Bank. So that there is no danger of the truth leaking out, as there would be if my agents were local people. Why I am at such pains to conceal this fact, I will explain. The plan originated with my dear father, who has now been dead for upwards of a year. My mother, I may mention, in passing, died when Phyllis was born. People, who knew my father prior to his bereavement, have often told me how devoted he was to my mother, and how tremendous an effect her death had upon him. They have more than hinted that his brain was permanently affected by that sorrow; and that the huge financial losses which afterwards overtook him were, in no small measure, due to his thereby impaired intelligence.

Those losses, however, are comparatively recent. They occurred when I was seventeen. Till then we had lived in a large house, with many servants, horses, and carriages. But within a few weeks all was changed. A bank with which my father was deeply involved, failed. We had to leave the big house and all the luxuries we had hitherto enjoyed, and to take a very tiny house indeed—this same house, in fact, where Phyllis and I still live. I remember often hearing my father say, at the time, that he was thankful enough to have been able to pay his liabilities and to have saved even five or six thousand pounds out of the wreck. And I remember, too, its striking me that he bore his ruin not merely with fortitude, but actually with cheerfulness, and that he seemed quite as happy in our humble home, waited on by one maid, as I had ever known him in our big house, with a score of servants at his call, and every luxury that money could buy.

It may be hardly necessary to say that our come-down in the world had the usual effect of separating our friends from us in the most complete and accurate manner. A few stuck to us from the first. A few dropped us from the first. These were the foolish among them, in opposite extremes. For as it is foolishly quixotic to stick to a ruined friend, so it is foolishly indecent to drop him out of hand. Wise folk do what the majority of our friends did. They just slacked off a little, and then a little more, and so on, by decent gradations. I had then many bosom friends among young girls in the neighbourhood. One of them named Laura Cleal wrote to me just after our change of fortune to say how sorry she was. Then she was my ever loving friend. In her next letter she was my very affectionately; then my affectionately; after that, my sincerely. To-day she is my very truly, and has been so any time these seven years. Were it not for the ordinary requirements of civility, she would doubtless by this time be my obediently. Laura Cleal, of course, is only a sample. I do not blame any such Laura Cleals, or the mammas or governesses who edited their letters and their affections. On the contrary, I am truly thankful to have been let down so gradually. For without any rude shock, I have found my proper level, which, after all, is an excellent thing for every one.

From the time of my father's ruin until I was twenty-one, the tenor of my life was humdrum and uneventful. But on my twenty-first birthday I had an extraordinary surprise. At breakfast on that day, among the letters and packets lying round my plate, there was a fat bulky envelope addressed to me in my father's handwriting. I opened it first, I remember, expecting to find some simple birthday gift, such as he had been accustomed to give me in previous years. You may judge of my inexpressible amazement when I pulled out of the envelope a pile of bank notes, and saw that the top one was for £1,000. Speechless with astonishment, I looked up at my father. He sat regarding me across the table—we were tête-à-tête, for Phyllis was staying away—with a curious quiet smile.

"You seem taken aback," said my father. "Perhaps you did not expect such a handsome present, Nell. And I don't think you understand yet what a handsome present it is. Count them, child."

With trembling fingers, and with a strange, dazed sensation, as though I were in a dream, I turned over the notes one by one. No! No! It could not be true—could not be true. Each note was for the same amount, £1,000, and I had counted 100 of them. £100,000 lying there before me on my plate! It was absurd, ridiculous, impossible!

"They are—are—not real," I gasped. "This is a hoax—a jest, father."

"They are real enough, Nell," he answered, "as, if you took them to the Bank of England, you would soon find. And this is no hoax, or jest, my dear. That is good money, Nell, and I have given it to you for your very own."

"But where has it come from, father?" I cried. "And why have you given it all to me?"

"It is my money, Nell," he said. "I have realised all, or nearly all my investments, in order to make you this present to-day."

I was still incredulous, unable to believe the evidence of my eyes or ears.

"But—but—I thought we were poor, father. I thought——"

"Exactly, my dear. Everybody thought so. Everybody thinks so. Listen, Nell; I have something to tell you. My losses four years ago were never anything like so extensive as people imagined. It was believed that the bulk of my property was invested in that bank. As a matter of fact, I had been quietly unloading my shares for some time previously, and the amount I dropped by the smash was inside £30,000. But it occurred to me—it was an odd notion to occur, too—that it might be a good jest to hoax all my friends into the belief that I was ruined, and see what the effect would be upon them. As a man of the world, I didn't expect very much of human nature; but I am bound to say I was hardly prepared for the pitiably mean manner in which at least ninety per cent. of my intimates behaved to me after my supposed smash. And I was looking forward, with some malicious enjoyment, to resuming my former status of a wealthy man, and seeing how they would manage to crawl or wriggle back into their old intimacy with me, when one day I happened to overhear a conversation between two ladies of our acquaintance (once of our bosom friends), who shall be nameless, Nell—a conversation which set me thinking of other matters, and, after due reflection, induced me to change my plans.

"You were the subject of that conversation, Nell; and what do you think these matrons were saying of you, my child? One of them remarked that she had always thought what a good spec. you would be for her eldest boy, and that it was the cruellest of shocks to her to find that you were merely the daughter of a pauper. And the other told her she ought to be very thankful that things had gone no further; for if the smash had been delayed a little longer, then you, Nell, might have been engaged to her son, and there would have been a dreadful complication! Thereupon the lady for whose son you had been marked out, my dear, was good enough to pity you. 'Poor child,' she said, 'with her plain face, she will never marry now.'"

I flushed when my father told me that, and the tears started to my eyes. I know that my looks are homely, as well as any one, and it was foolish of me to be hurt. But I could not help it. My dear father saw, and he came round to me and took my unattractive face between his hands.

"Well," he said, smiling into my tearful eyes very fondly, "I did not think to wound you, little woman. The criticisms of such contemptible creatures are never worth minding. And if your face is not beautiful, dear" (with such words was my fondly prejudiced old father pleased to comfort me), "it is better than beautiful; it is honest and tender and true, and I would not have it different for all the world."

I dried my tears and smiled and kissed him. I knew the encomium was undeserved. But I knew that my father meant what he said; and it is a comfort to be loved by some one so much, that he sees one different from what one is. Nowadays, there is no one sees me thus.

After that, he said:

"Nell, my dear, when I overheard these remarks, which I have told you, it at once set me thinking about your future. And I came to the conclusion that you should not become 'a good spec.' for money-hunters. Girls are easily deceived, my dear—especially when they are just on the threshold of life; and these scheming fellows are mighty clever at feigning love and devotion. No, no! You are not to be married for your money; you are to be married for yourself, and yourself alone. I determined that I would see to that, as far as I could. With that end in view, I kept up our semblance of poverty, Nell—I have kept it up until this minute, and I wish to keep it up still, until the right man comes, Nell, the man who is good enough to appreciate and love you, the man who shall make you truly happy. You deserve him, Nell—you deserve the best husband that the world has to offer." (Dear, blind, foolish old father thus to speak of poor commonplace me!) "And some day—some day—he will come."

"I—I—don't want to marry, father," I said, smiling, yet greatly touched by his deep concern for my welfare. "I have you. You are better than any husband, dear."

"Even if I were," he answered, "I shall not live for ever. Nay, Nell, I shall not live much longer. My health is breaking now, as I can feel. And that is why I have made this money over to you now, my child. You are to come with me to London to-day; you are to have it all invested in your name. It is to be yours from to-day, absolutely. And when I die the estate that I shall leave will be just a few thousands—nothing more. And no one will ever guess that you have £100,000 of your own, my dear. But promise me, Nell, promise me—for I know that you will do what you promise—that until the right man comes, and loves you, and makes you his wife, you will keep the existence of this money just as dead a secret as it has been hitherto!"

I tried to dissuade my father from his scheme. I tried to say that I would not take the money. But he was so set upon it, so eager, so insistent, that, to please him, I at last gave way. . . . .

And so it is that, without any one knowing it, I am now absolute mistress of a large fortune—a fortune which, with its accumulation of unspent income, is growing larger every year. And I still live with Phyllis, in the same small house, and the same small way. And the right man has not come and married me. And I know that now he never will.

Yes; I know it—too well. There is only one who could ever be the right man for me. And he—— But, no! I will not say it. I will try not even to think it. It is mean, pitiable, wicked to be jealous of my little sister. And, in this case, absurd also. For even if there were no Phyllis, how should handsome Rupert ever give a thought to ugly me? I will choke down this foolish, envious weakness. And when he speaks, and makes Phyllis happy, I will be glad and rejoice with—with—all my heart.

At last, I think I have found out why Rupert has not spoken to Phyllis. It is curious that I have not thought of it before. Rupert has no money; nothing beyond his pay as managing clerk in a country solicitor's office. It is only £250 a year, and he does not like—does not think it fair—to ask her to marry him, when he can offer her nothing better than that. He did not exactly tell me this. But from hints which he has let fall in his conversation, and from inquiries which I have since made, I have no doubt that this is the reason. To be sure, Phyllis is very young—little more than a child; and Rupert is only twenty-seven. They can easily wait. But then, as I understand, Rupert has no capital to buy a partnership or set up for himself; and he may have to wait many years before his income is materially enlarged. What a topsy-turvy world! The loveless and moneyed rubbing shoulders daily with the loved and moneyless; and each pining for only a taste of the other's happiness, yet unable to obtain it. Why cannot some one readjust the balances?

Some one? Who? Why not I? How can I hesitate? I will go up and see my solicitor to-day.

I have been. I have seen him. I am sure he thought me quite idiotic. At first he tried to pooh-pooh my scheme. But when he found me insistent, he agreed to do what I wished. The only difficulty was to give Rupert the financial lift he needed without letting him know the source from which it came. But, after some reflection, my solicitor thought it could be managed. He is personally intimate, it seems, with the head of Rupert's firm; and he considered that, if sufficient capital were forthcoming, arrangements might be made with him for taking Rupert into partnership. This seemed as practicable a scheme as any. And I have left it with him to make the necessary arrangements, stipulating that sufficient capital must be laid out for Rupert's benefit to insure a return of at least £1,000 per annum. . . . .

Three weeks have passed since then. I hear from my solicitor that matters have been satisfactorily arranged. I should have guessed it, even if I had not heard from him; for Rupert, who has been here every day for the last four or five days, has been, as I could see, bubbling over with joyful, yet half-suppressed, excitement. He has not spoken to Phyllis yet; but he is coming again this afternoon, and I am sure he means to speak then, for there was something in his manner of announcing his intended visit for to-day that said so plainly . . . Ah! there he is now—coming up the road. I must run and find Phyllis. Phyllis must be alone to receive him when he comes in.

How tiresome! how annoying? I cannot find Phyllis anywhere. What can have become of her? There is Rupert ringing the bell now! Phyllis! Phyllis! She is nowhere in the house, it seems. She must have gone out; and yet she knew Rupert was coming, and she must have guessed, from his manner, why. Perhaps she did not expect him quite so early. I must go down and talk to Rupert till she comes in. . . .

* * * * *

How blue the sky is this afternoon! How bright the sun shines! How sweetly the birds are singing! Truly life is delicious on a day like this, and there is an intoxicating joy in every breath one draws. I love every one to-day—every one—every one. Do you know why? It is all because some one loves me.

Yes, would you believe it? Rupert loved me from the first. And Phyllis knew, and she never told me. Sly little Phyllis. But I'm glad I did not know before. Else I could never have bought that partnership for Rupert. And should I ever have heard the truth then?

Do you hear that robin chirruping in the apple tree? I never noticed little Bobby's note before. It is strange how unobservant one is. But now you come to listen, you cannot fail to remark it, can you? Hark! There he goes, as plain as plain. "Hap-py—hap-py—hap-py!"

ART NOTES.

AUSTRALIAN PICTURES AT THE GRAFTON GALLERIES.

A MOST interesting exhibition. It was rather a bold experiment for Australia to make, but of its success there can be no possible doubt. Over three hundred pictures are hung, all of them painted in Australia, by Australian artists, and the general result is unexpectedly good. Perhaps what most surprises one is the independence of British artistic influences to which the majority of the pictures bear witness. There has been no slavish adherence to British art tradition, and there are but few signs of the influence of British art training. Now and then, it is true, one comes upon pictures which are reminiscent of the work of some of our more popular artists. There are suggestions here and there of Mr. Waterhouse and of Mr. Stott, of Mr. Lavery and of Mr. Whistler, but these are but exceptions to the rule. What is generally apparent is that Australia has gone to Paris rather than to London for its art inspiration. It is French influences which one traces in the works of nearly all the Australian artists who most distinguish themselves. To expect to find any veritable masterpieces in the collection would be a little unreasonable. There is no picture that challenges attention as a work of art of the highest order. But what it is so satisfactory to find is evidence of much promise on every hand. Australia has started well on the arduous path that leads to artistic success and fame, and its future progress will be watched with a newly-awakened interest on this side of the world.

It is pleasant to find, too, that most of the pictures shown are Antipodean in something more than their source. They are characteristically Australian in the landscapes they present, the incidents they depict, the faces they portray. It is on strange and unfamiliar scenes that the visitor to the Grafton Galleries looks. He sees towering trees that he feels instinctively must be eucalyptus—unless, indeed, they happen to be gum. He looks on parched yellow slopes down which wild cattle wildly stampede, and on precipitous roads along which thousands of odd-looking sheep are rushing in clouds of torrid dust, escorted by gaunt shepherds of an anything but Oriental type, for their pastoral crook has been exchanged for a long-lashed whip, and they bestride powerful and well-trained steeds of the breed known, I believe, as "walers." He sees squatters tracking the wallaby, and explorers starving in the arid scrub of the Australian interior. In short, he gets many glimpses of Australian life and customs painted with remarkable vigour and with local colour that in many cases is absolutely convincing. Of all the artists represented it seems to me that Mr. Tom Roberts is most strongly and characteristically Australian. He paints with remarkable dash and verve; and puts into his pictures all the grip and force that Lindsay Gordon used to put into his poems. Talent of a high order is to be seen in "A Breakaway," the draughtsmanship being really admirable. The subject of "The Golden Fleece" is not so pleasing, but in this, a very vivid presentation of a sheep-shearing scene, the drawing, as distinguished from the colouring, is masterful. Australia has just reason to be proud of Mr. Tom Roberts. Mr. E. P. Fox has also the making of a good artist in him. He is very modern in his style, and has turned to excellent account the art training which, unless I am greatly mistaken, he must have received in the capital of France. He is not nearly so essentially Australian as Mr. Tom Roberts, however.

Another artist who distinguishes himself is Mr. Arthur Streeton, who, like Mr. Tom Roberts, is racy of the soil that gave him birth. I doubt if there is a better landscape in the Show than his "Purple Noon's Transparent Light" (No. 62), a view taken on the Hawkesbury River in New South Wales. This admirable picture, as characteristic in its way as "A Breakaway" and "A Mountain Muster," is lent by the Trustees of the Melbourne Gallery, who have done all they can to make an Exhibition promoted by the authorities of the National Art Gallery of New South Wales a success. One thing that will specially strike the visitor to the Grafton Galleries is the apparent absence of air from the pictures. There is no atmosphere such as we expect to see in British landscapes. But this, I take it, is due to the brilliant clearness of the sunlight in Australia, and cannot fairly be reckoned a defect.

Mortlock's (Oxford-st.), Estd. A.D. 1746.—The collection of China and Glass now on view in their Galleries fully maintains the high reputation and pre-eminence enjoyed by "Mortlock's" for the last century and a half, and well repays a visit of inspection.

MUSIC.

LIMITED LIABILITY MUSICAL DIPLOMAS.

I HAVE received a letter from a correspondent who tells me that the craze for musical diplomas distributed by imited liability companies is now rampant in Derbyshire, nd especially in mid-Derby. The High Peak News has, t seems, been talking very plainly on the subject, parieularly in regard to somebody who has been sporting he initials "F. C. V." and "A. C. V." A reference to the bsurdity of these appendages to any one's name drew from n anonymous correspondent, who signed himself "Justice," letter of the usual character, dealing largely with eneralities, and I am bound to say more or less full of naccuracies. The writer, after reading a High Peak aragraph "reflecting upon the worth of the diplomas ranted by the London College of Violinists," cannot say whether surprise, amusement, pity, contempt, or indignaon was the uppermost feeling." Moreover, he points iumphantly to the opinion of a local critic, who, after a iolin performance by one of the ladies who has adopted iese initials, eloquently and gallantly declared that "her laying was of such a character as to excite the sympathy f her audience to such an extent that even strong ien displayed considerable emotion at her marvellous erformance."

I have no doubt the young lady is fully worthy of all the ood things which are said about her, and it is, therefore, ie more regrettable that she should sport initials which she ight quite as lawfully, and much more economically, have onferred upon herself. The grocer round the corner, or ie potman of the local public house, has just as much right -no less and no more—to grant "diplomas" and initial tters as the so-called London College of Violinists. As a atter of fact, there is no "College" at all, and the asseron of the anonymous writer in the Derby paper that "the ost eminent professors, British and Foreign, and istinguished lovers of music, were the original founders of ie College," is the merest froth. I dealt with the whole atter in TRUTH on June 3 last, and not only with this it also with the Guild of Violinists (otherwise the Interational Union of Musicians), the College of Pianists wned chiefly by the family of a plumber), and other stitutions. The College of Violinists, as I then pointed it, on the evidence of the official documents at Somerset ouse, was nothing more than a limited liability speculaon, with a total cash paid-up capital of £17 10s. The areholders were a musical instrument dealer, his wife d two daughters and his son (a law student), besides a wspaper proprietor, a commercial clerk (afterwards proted to be a journalist), and a solitary professor of music. pa, the musical instrument dealer, was Managing Director, d four other gentlemen, including one whose name did t appear upon the list of shareholders, constituted the Board of Directors." Papa also was Managing Director life and Chairman of all extraordinary meetings of e Company. It is from this precious party that the plomas and initial letters of the College of Violinists anate; and their exact worth can, I should say, easily be praised.

These diploma speculations are not expensive to start. e total paid-up capital (barring that "agreed to be conlered as paid") contributed by the shareholders (seven told) of the "College of Violinists" was only £17 10s. ong the lot. Concerning the examinations of this onomically conducted enterprise I personally, of course, ow nothing. They may, for aught I know, be very rching or quite the contrary. But the diplomas issued the expense and profit of the musical instrument dealer, wife, two daughters and son (a law student) the comrcial clerk (now promoted to be a journalist) and the wspaper proprietor, pretty as they may be as pictures, not recognised by the heads of the musical community the same way, for example, the diplomas granted under authority of the Prince of Wales by the Royal Academy l Royal College of Music.

Last year I referred to a rather sweeping condemnation limited liability degrees printed in the preface to my esteemed contemporary, "Crockford's Clerical Directory." A new "Directory" has recently been published, but the preface deals more especially with foreign and Colonial degrees. It justifiably protests against a proposed revival of the "In absentiâ" degrees granted by Trinity College, Toronto. These ridiculous titles (one, it is said, granted for a hymn tune) were stopped in 1890, after the sturdy protest of the heads of British music and of the British Universities. There are, however, other and even less responsible institutions still selling foreign degrees and diplomas in this country, and the current issue of the Musical Directory contains the name of a gentleman who claims to be a Mus. Doc. of the "Druidic University of State of New York, U.S.A," whatever that may be. The Union of British Graduates in Music intend, I believe, to take up the case of these foreign degrees. They would do far more useful work by agitating in Parliament and elsewhere against a law which permits the wholesale dissemination of degrees and diplomas by limited liability companies and other non-chartered institutions in this country.

About a month ago I happened to mention that music publishers, who are great sufferers by the street music pirates, proposed to take the matter up vigorously, and hoped to interest the Government in the question. The street pirates lay unholy hands upon some of the most valuable copyrights. The songs are reprinted in cheap form, and are sold in the streets at various prices, the words of some of them as low as twenty a penny, and words and music at a penny to threepence each. This naturally injures the rights both of publishers and composers. One publisher took the matter into his own hands a few weeks ago, discovered the public-house from which most of these songs were distributed, seized some two or three thousand copies, and likewise pouncing upon the street hawkers, seized all their stock, amid immense astonishment, not to say protests cast in vigorous language. Such a step, however, cannot be taken until after an injunction has been obtained; and as the printer is rarely to be found, and when discovered is a man of straw, the remedy by injunction is costly and unsatisfactory.

Mr. Leslie Stuart, the composer of a highly-popular song entitled "Soldiers of the Queen" has now addressed the Solicitor-General upon the matter. He sends me this long letter, which I have no room to quote in full. He states that an Attorney-General was petitioned some years ago by various publishers to issue his fiat under the Act 2 Vic. cap. 12, and refused, on the ground that the Act was not intended to cover this particular form of infringement. Mr. Stuart points out that, emboldened by the state of the law, a great development of this illicit traffic commenced about last April in issuing not only the words, but also exact reproductions of the music of some of the most popular songs of the day, the printer's name and address, of course, being omitted. "The Soldiers of the Queen" was sold at various prices, from a 1d. or 2d. to 6d. a copy in the streets, although the legitimate music trade paid, wholesale, 10d. to 1s. 4d. a copy, the composer receiving a royalty of 2½d. a copy. Mr. Stuart estimates his loss on this one song at £250, and the publishers at still more. He and the publishers, after employing detectives for four months, discovered the printer, who had, it is estimated, disposed of 100,000 copies to the hawkers About 800 were found in his possession, and were confiscated, and the plates at once destroyed: all this, of course, at a great expense. It seems that the copies were printed in a small house tenanted by the wife, and that the man's effects were not worth 5s., so no damages or costs could be obtained from him, although over £100 was spent in his detection. However, there seem to be better times in store for Mr. Stuart and his friends. Although he does not appear to be aware of it, an injunction (one was granted to Messrs. Francis & Day last week) will forbid future piracies of the same publisher's works; while Lord Herschell's Bill, now before the House of Lords, authorises the police to seize plates and stocks of printers and hawkers of pirated music, and to hale all parties before a police-magistrate, who has the power to fine and imprison the delinquents. The composer of "The Soldiers of the Queen" should, therefore, in justice, write a music-hall hymn of thanksgiving to the Liberal Lord Chancellor.

Mr. J. H. Mapleson is up and smiling again, with a full-blown scheme for a summer opera season at the Olympic Theatre, the house which, it may be recollected, saw the very last of that enterprising impresario, Signor Lago. I am not going here to discuss the financial merits of Mr. Mapleson's scheme, which do not concern this column. It will suffice that the share capital of the "New Italian Opera Syndicate, Limited," Mr. Mapleson fixes at £30,000, plus £20,000 Five per Cent. Debentures, the directors being Mr. George Paget, Mr. G. E. Keith, and Captain C. J. Rolleston, and that the vendor has fixed the purchase money at £30,000, one-third of which is to be in cash. The scheme, it is claimed, will give an annual season of at least six months of Italian opera at the Olympic Theatre, the price of seats being about one-half of those charged at Covent Garden except as to the private boxes, which, it seems, are to be let upon special terms. The Olympic, it is said, holds 3,500 persons, but for operatic purposes the seats will be limited to about 2,000. One month in the year will, it is promised, be given up to performances by the Students of the Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and the Guildhall School of Music, supposing, of course, that those Institutions agree to accept the offer. Mr. Mapleson declares his intention to produce several new works and to revive operas by half-forgotten masters such as Spontini, Bellini, Donizetti, and others, and (like the Imperial Institute) he announces that arrangements are in progress for the engagement of an orchestra from La Scala, Milan. He claims that he has the scenery for fifteen operas, some of which has never been used, as well as the costumes, properties, and so forth for each opera, and "the celebrated Dragonetti Library consisting of about seventy operas by the greatest masters, many of which have never been performed." He proposes to open the Olympic next month, but opera goers will be better able to judge of the prospects of the enterprise when the repertory and the list of artists are before them.

It is announced in Milan that the Orchestral Society of La Scala is about to be disbanded after a career of twenty years. I believe this is the band which has been engaged, through the intermediary of Signor Randegger, for the Imperial Institute this summer. There is, it is true, a scheme to reorganise the Society, but without a further Government grant, which is not at all likely to be made, the concerts, it seems, cannot continue. This subvention of the band, by the way, may partly explain the fact that the Italian players are able to pay their travelling and hotel expenses in England, and even then to undersell the resident British player.

Concerts, except as to the sacred performances on Good Friday, are suspended during Easter, and considering the rush of music towards the latter end of Lent, the holiday will doubtless be appreciated by the public as well as by professors. The vacation, however, is a very short one, and by the end of the week we shall be at it again. The Crystal Palace Concerts continue, although, as Mr. Manns was ill of bronchitis, he was last Saturday replaced by Mr. Cowen, while within the next few weeks we shall have the pianoforte recitals of Mr. Arthur Friedheim, who, by the way, in some newspapers is absurdly enough described as a débutant; the recitals of M. de Pachmann, who will return to us after an absence of a good many years; besides recitals by Herr Rosenthal, Herr Liebling, and numerous other pianists. Also towards the end of the month the Mottl concerts will be resumed; while on May 9 we shall have the opening of the opera season at Covent Garden.

Details of the Good Friday concerts would be unnecessary. There is one point, however, which has excited some surprise. For fifty years, Rossini's Stabat Mater was one of the most popular compositions in the sacred repertory. For more than a quarter of a century down to last Friday it has been a feature of the sacred concert annually given on Good Friday at St. James's Hall. This year, however, it was for the first time abandoned in favour of a miscellaneous sacred concert. The re-opening of the Alexandra Palace was another of the events of Good Friday. The Palace, so beautifully situated on the summit of Muswell Hill, with a panorama of views all round it, has been closed for about nine years, although the building seems still to be in an excellent state of preservation and repair. The Palace was re-opened with the "Messiah," with a band and chorus of over one thousand, under Mr. Riseley, of Bristol, and it may eventually revive its old musical glories won so deservedly in the time of the late Weist Hill. There is a large population at Muswell Hill and its neighbourhood, large enough, at any rate, to support a proper musical scheme adequately carried out. So far as the London public are concerned, the Alexandra Palace, like the Crystal Palace, suffers a good deal from the train service. You can often get from London Bridge to Brighton quicker than you can from London Bridge to the Alexandra Palace.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—"The Ballad of Reading Gaol" (1) reminds you a little of the walk round and round, round and round the prison courtyard during which it was composed. Its author, "C. 3. 3.," "jades the thing too far," as Bacon expresses it. He wears the same thought, and even the same words, threadbare by monotonous repetition, till a poem which makes you hold your breath when you begin it makes you yawn before you finish it. Indeed, I never read a poem which tempted me more to exclaim with Hesiod, "Fool, not to know how much half exceeds the whole!" In another and more important point also "C. 3. 3." overshoots the mark—his description of the infamies of gaol diet, discipline, and tyranny. No one is more firmly convinced than I of the brutalising effect of gaol discipline upon the prisoners, and no one would have welcomed more eagerly such an exposure of it as would lead to its reform; but "C. 3. 3." so overcharges his gun that there is a violent recoil. I cannot, however, resist giving you a few passages from his indictment—it is so powerfully expressed:—

I know not whether laws be right,
Or whether laws be wrong;
All that we know who lie in gaol,
Is that the wall is strong;
And that each day is like a year,
A year whose days are long.

But this I know, that every law
That men have made for man,
Since first man took his brother's life,
And the sad world began;
But straws the wheat and saves the chaff
With a most evil fan.

This too I know—and wise it were
If each could know the same—
That every prison that men build,
Is built with bricks of shame;
And bound with bars lest Christ should see
How men their brothers maim.

With bars they blur the gracious moon,
  And blind the goodly sun;
And they do well to hide their Hell,
  For in it things are done
That Son of God nor son of man
  Ever should look upon!

The vilest deeds, like poison weeds,
  Bloom well in prison air;
It is only what is good in man
  That wastes and withers there;
And Anguish keeps the heavy gate,
  And the warder is Despair.

For they starve the little, frightened child
  Till it weeps both night and day;
And they scourge the weak and flog the fool,
  And gibe the old and gray;
And some grow mad, and all grow bad,
  And none a word may say.

. . . . .

With midnight always in one's heart,
  And twilight in one's cell,
We turn the crank, or tear the rope,
  Each in his separate Hell,
And the silence is more awful far
  Than the sound of a brazen bell.

And never a human voice comes near
  To speak a gentle word:
And the eye that watches through the door
  Is pitiless and hard:
And by all forgot, we rot and rot,
  With soul and body marred.

And thus we rust Life's iron chain
  Degraded and alone:
And some men curse, and some men weep,
  And some men make no moan:
But God's eternal Laws are kind
  And break the heart of stone.

In "Tenebræ" (2), Reading Gaol seems to have broken loose and joined forces with Broadmoor, so many and monstrous are its horrors. They are, perhaps, a little crude, but those who like blood-curdling stories can "sup full" here of their favourite fiery stimulant, which, to borrow a happy Irish description of bad whiskey, "goes down your throat like a torchlight procession." "His Grace o' the Gunne" (3) has to do with crime also; but there is no crudeness of treatment here, for Miss Hooper deals delicately and gracefully with her subject, and interests you rather in her criminals than in their crimes. It really is a very pretty and pleasant story in spite of its criminal subject. There is certainly nothing pretty and pleasant about "The Devil in a Domino" (4). It is a frankly morbid study in criminal psychology; but the story is written with remarkable literary skill, and, notwithstanding its gruesomeness, is undeniably fascinating. Apropos of criminal subjects, I can recommend confidently to you the best volume of "The Criminology Series" I have yet read—Mr. Louis Proal's "Political Crime" (5). Its very preface cries to you, "Sursum Corda!" in such passages as this:—

The art of governing has been disfigured by a great number of false maxims, which have made it the art of lying and deceiving, the art of proscribing and despoiling under a cloak of legality. It is these sophisms that I propose to combat. Humanity has had for its governors slaughterers, fanatics, robbers, false coiners, bankrupts, madmen, men who have been corrupt and have sown corruption. There are no greater malefactors than the political malefactors who foment divisions and hatreds by their ambition, cupidity and rivalries

What piece is this "that roars so loud and thunders in the index?" An admirable piece, I assure you, and opportune also. Not least admirable and opportune is this extract of good augury from a speech of Lord Salisbury's delivered at Hastings in 1892.

Civilisation has substituted law court decisions for duels between private persons and conflicts between the great. International wars are destined in the same way to give place in the courts of arbitration of a more advanced civilisation.

This millennial hope, which was not always Lord Salisbury's, is probably held more firmly by him to-day than in 1892. Sir George Goldie has taken the discreet precaution of many reviewers of not reading the work he praises, lest he might thus be prejudiced against it. Seriously, though, it is odd to find Lieutenant Vandeleur's always interesting and occasionally exciting "Campaigning on the Upper Nile and Niger" (6) prefaced by Sir George's disavowal of having read a line of it. As there might be something offensive to France in the book, he thought it more discreet in view of his quasi-official position to deny himself the great pleasure—for it is a great pleasure—of reading it. It is really astonishing what effective leadership will make of the most unpromising military material, increasing its value, as the value of ciphers is increased by an initial figure. Under Lieutenant Vandeleur, 500 Hausas withstood for two days 30,000 Fulahs, their former and most formidable masters, "and though they had never before faced cavalry, they stood firm under charges home on to the faces of their squares, maintained perfect fire-discipline, and delivered their volleys as steadily as if on parade." It was touch and go, however, for if fortune had not favoured the brave, the little force must have been annihilated. Let me, in conclusion, draw your attention to the admirable new edition of Balzac which is in process of publication by Messrs. Dent & Co. The translations are uniformly good, and each volume—the latest is "The Jealousies of a Country Town" (7)—has a preface by Mr. George Saintsbury.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, very sincerely yours, DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

P.S.—I have reserved for mention here one work which will be a boon to many—the new dictionary (8) published by Messrs. Chambers. Judging from the results of a series of random tests, it is singularly comprehensive and accurate.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—We spent a happy morning among the picture galleries in and about Bond-street one day last week, when Richard had run down to Portsmouth to meet an old brother officer just home from India. To feel that there is no one waiting lunch for one imparts an agreeable feeling of leisureliness, and we enjoyed this to the full. First we turned into the Grafton Gallery and fell deeply in love with Mr. Tudor Tucker's "Sunset," a green-gold sea with long, placid, restful, sun-kissed waves, in which some children are delighting, the rosy sunbeams lighting up their little faces. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain was being conducted through the Galleries while we were there, and we congratulated ourselves, by no means for the first time, on our insignificance which permits us to wander there and here at our own sweet will, without a convoy of attentive escorts. To be a celebrity is not all roses, but perhaps when one becomes a celebrity one likes this sort of homage. Who can tell?

Next we turned into Dowdeswell's, and found the usual crowd silently gazing on Munkacsy's "Ecce Homo." We had been commissioned by a friend to inquire about the prices of the engravings of it, and found that they range from two guineas to ten, according to the quality of the proof. We also saw the engraving of Byam Shaw's picture in last year's Academy, "The Comforter." You will remember it. It is beautifully engraved.

At the Fine Art Society's the girls grew immensely sentimental over the "Charge of the Gordon Highlanders at Dargai" as depicted by Mr. Allan Stewart. For my part I detest battle pictures, and wish that war had never been invented, but the girls made me look at Piper Findlater sitting calmly skirling his bagpipes in full reach of the enemy's fire, and with but too evident proof of his wounded ankle to be seen in the picture. He is surrounded by dead and dying, and some of the figures are distressingly touching. Wreaths of laurel and cypress are placed against the wall beneath the picture, tied with ribbons bearing the names of the four regiments engaged in the battle. There is a mistake, by the way, in the description of the affair given in the beginning of the explanatory paragraph. Piper Findlater is said to have been playing "Cock o' the North," but it was Milnes who played this inspiring air, poor Milnes who was shot through both lungs, but is slowly recovering. Findlater was playing the regimental march past.

New Spring Fashions.—Messrs. Redfern have now on view in their Showrooms a unique display of Toilettes, illustrative of the latest London and Paris fashions, and to which they invite an inspection.—26, Conduit-street, London, W.

Have you read that a few women have written proposing marriage to Findlater? "A mad world, my masters!"

Bee bought an India print of the "Last Stand of Major Wilson," and is having it framed for her room. It is well to remember these brave fellows, but I do not think I want to see such saddening things the moment I open my eyes in the morning. Plenty of depressing circumstances rain into one's life. Why introduce others? But girls love to be sad now and then when they are in their teens. When they begin to "get on" they are less willing to cry about nothing and indulge in fancied sentimental woes, April showers, as it were.

On our way to lunch at the newly-opened Avondale we passed by Van Hier's lovely window, filled with his dreamy, misty pictures—such a contrast to the stern realities we had just left. I inwardly thanked goodness for a cheery world full of beautiful things—flowers, music, art, brightness—in the midst of which we may forget the inevitable sadness. But I carefully respected the girls' tender mood, remembering similar experiences in my own early youth.

I found, however, that a good lunch had a marvellously restorative effect on their gaiety. They were soon making jokes, and laughing at them as girls love to do. By-the-way, what an epicure's mouth April is! Though March brings us the earliest asparagus and peas, the baby carrot, and the infant turnip, it is April that makes the prices possible. Is 5s. too much to pay for "the first, fine, careless rapture" of the gourmet discussing his early asparagus? Certainly not! There is ever about the gastronomic joys of April a finer touch that after, throughout the year, eludes even the most practised and deliberate, who give to every mouthful a separate thought. Strawberries at 4s. a basket are appreciated by the gastronome with the addition of that subtle factor in all pleasures of the palate, the consciousness that only a limited number of individuals are sharing in them. The idea that the whole nation is eating them has, in June, its due effect upon the fastidious. The egotism of the gourmet is regarded by him as a virtue, not a fault. And does not April give us plovers' eggs? The first arrivals cost a frightful price, it is true, but hope looks on into the future with greedy anticipation. Last season some one discovered that the gull had been made an innocent accomplice in the perpetration of a horrid fraud upon the gastronomic public. Gulls' eggs, deftly coloured to imitate nature's correct tint of deep, warm cream-colour, had been palmed off upon the unsuspecting. Let discriminating palates be on their guard!

April brings us the first young, juicy leaves of the sorrel, and the salad to be evolved therefrom is not to be despised, for more reasons than those connected with the pleasures of the table. And can there be a more appropriate culotte for the bony extremity of a lamb cutlet or the legs of a spring chicken than a purée made of the pretty, pointed leaves? On April 1 last year, there were green gooseberries in the London markets, but I have not seen any as yet this spring. Perhaps the recent hard weather has induced the parent bushes to forbid outdoor life to their baby fruit. Salmon, too, gets cheaper in April, and trout is approaching its finest stage, and there is something about early trout that is never associated with later days. Apropos to culinary matters, I must tell you an amusing story about a cook whom a friend of ours was interviewing last week. She said, "Would you kindly tell me, Madam, how often you dine out?" "About once a fortnight just now, I should think," replied our friend. "But why do you ask?" "Because I could not take any place," was the reply, "where the lady and gentleman do not dine out two or three times a week. Cooking a dinner every night is so wearing to the nerves." Just fancy! Suppose one were to make such an arrangement—though it is difficult to imagine any one making it—and that one were to have a cold or some slight ailment, which, while leaving the appetite unimpaired, would prevent one from going to dinner parties or restaurants. There would be no dinner on at least two evenings in the week. How nice for an invalid!

We are astonished at the enormous number of "Mansions," as houses composed of flats have now come to be called, arising all over London. Not only in central districts are they to be seen, but in Suburbia as well, and no sooner are they finished than they are immediately occupied, before even the walls have had time to dry, one would think. We all prophesied, some five or six years ago, that the reign of flats would be a short one, but the prophecy was all wrong. The convenience of these residences all on one or two floors commends them to thousands, as well as the advantage of being able to leave them with safety, as no one could dare to leave a house. And then it is so pleasant to know that no taxes are to be sprung upon one at inconvenient seasons, except, of course, that horrid income-tax, which every one detests so sincerely.

We were shopping at Evans' the other day, and saw such pretty English silks piled on a counter. We at once examined them and were told that, being free from duty, they are extremely cheap. And so we found them. The colours are well assorted and the patterns well chosen. I liked very much one that had a hair-line in black on a ground of poppy-red. For summer skirts nothing could be nicer than these silks, and we noticed many in shades of grey in narrow stripes, and others striped in mauve and grey, and so on, just the right kind of thing for summer gowns. Clare bought herself a sweet one with a grey ground so pale as to be almost white, striped with a hair-cord in black. She is going to have it lined with pink and wear it with a pink glacé silk blouse like those I told you we had seen last week at Sykes Josephine's.

We always stop and look in at the window of 143, Regent-street, where the Parisian Diamond Company have spread enchantments for the temptation of spectators. Bee was greatly taken with a range of pearls, and as an apropos birthday is approaching we went in to ask the price. There we found Mr. Sanderson himself, an enthusiast about pearls, and he explained to us the endless differences that exist between these beautiful things that, to the casual eye, appear so much alike. Could you believe that no two pearls are ever precisely similar? Some are globular, some spherical, some oblong, others approaching the square in outline. And again, in the matter of colour, there are endless differences. Only the Scotch pearls (found in the Tay) are pure white. In the others are to be found every possible tint of cream colour—ivory, and even a tone of beige. In weight, too, there is again a difference. Now, just imagine the difficulties that beset the path of the workpeople who have to reproduce the real pearls in imitation! The infinite ways in which Nature has differentiated these children of the waters have to be deftly copied, each pearl made in a different mould, of a different tint, and of varied shape; it is only the cheap glass bead pearls that are all alike, as if turned out of a manufactory. One somehow loves the sweet pearls better for being all different from each other. It gives them something in common with humanity. Pearls are now the most fashionable form of jewellery. I think this should be so. They are far lovelier than diamonds.

By the way, dear, we saw some beautiful diamond-headed combs there. A large comb, you know, is now almost indispensable to the fashionable coiffure. The one I liked best had a Louis XV. design in diamonds, the centre being in the honeycomb pattern, and outlined with sweet little floral sprays and points, all in Parisian amonds. Another had the top of the comb inverted, e centre being lower than the sides. This, too, was vered with diamonds in a tiara shape. Diamond slides e saw, too, in every variety, and dear little charms for e bangle—diamond monkeys, elephants, squirrels, &c. me turquoises of a heavenly blue delighted our eyes. rrings (they are coming in again!) of these were set in amonds, and had a most attractive look. In fact, the ace was full of tempting things, the designs being in ny cases more poetically pretty than one often sees in al jewellery. A string of pearls imitated from the iginal, which were worth several thousand pounds, was ld up before an expert, and he was unable to say which ere the true and which the false.

I am sending you Redfern's "Open Letter." You will d it full of information about the coming fashions, and, tter still, it contains some valuable hints on good taste, nich no one is in a better position to give than a lady's ilor, whose experience ranges from reigning empresses wn to the nice little Miss Nobody who has money ough and sense enough to go to the best sartorial guide e can find. The illustrations are wonderfully neat and etty, and, of course, completely up-to-date—in fact, up to-morrow's date. That is one of the advantages of ing to a good house. One's gown is not out of date fore it is half worn out.

Clare sends me the following from Ireland:—

Dearest Madge,—How few understand the art of taking a liday, or rather, how few practise it with skill and understand-g. A holiday time should be one of recreation in the true aning of the word; a time of renewal and repair, so far as ay be, after the wear and tear and the struggles of life. Each e's holiday should be a thing for himself, to suit his individual eds. It should begin with diagnosis, the eye turned inwardly one's self, instead of outwardly—with the view to imitation—one's neighbour. Then the repairs could be made to suit each e—the strain lessened where it had been greatest, the wear d tear met with the treatment needed by the special form they d taken. With this object a holiday should be thought out efully and cunningly planned, not taken indiscriminately and elessly. How many more blessings would be invoked on iday times then! How they would really recreate us! Whereas mostly take them now, with as little thought as the lobster es his bodily repairs, when Nature renews the claws which his ow lobsters have torn from him in the struggle of life.

There are those who think that a life devoted to Society and nsement does not need a holiday. How little they know! ly let them try it. The labour of a work day, with its limited rs and narrow scope of business, is nothing to that of a ociety" day, or, rather, day and night, with its infinite variety occupation. The world that amuses itself certainly earns and ds a holiday, though it generally takes care that it should not a time of recreation, but of accentuated rush and labour.

The Fates have been kind to us this Easter—restfully, recreagly kind. Here we are in the quiet country, far from the dding crowd, which, however, has a few representatives in the se where we are staying—amongst the primroses and the bs, and with the "hum" of humanity's "mighty workings" hanged for the singing of the birds. We have the new dress of ure to study instead of the new millinery fashions. Nature her spring costume very early in wear this year. Already the gerows are turning green, and the sycamores and other early s bursting timidly into leaf. One hopes that the April ther may not treat them rudely and blight the green freshness heir tender youth. The gaudy spring gardens are in full om, but the cultivated flowers cannot compare with the wild s of spring. What is sweeter than the woody places starred h primroses, except those that are carpeted with bluebells?

ed's delights are not, of course, like mine, in connection with "vegetable kingdom." The birds are just now safe from his ghtering habits, I believe, but he has the fishes. Some men cience advance the theory that plants, like animals, have s; that flowers feel a death-pang when they are plucked. pose Fred had this belief, I often wonder if he, too, would r into the enjoyment of gathering primroses.

Never a day passes but I invoke blessings on the man who found out cycling. Not that I do the thing myself, when it might be quite otherwise. But the others all do it. It al s the restless, old and young, and leaves the tranquil to the undisturbed enjoyment of tranquility. One is safe from being included in cycling excursions, with the early start, the labours of the "scorching" day, and the late—at this season generally belated—return home. The house party that "scorches" forth on fine mornings takes my benediction with it. If only they would not talk "bike" in the evenings! But it is no worse than talking "horse." And one does not get many other alternatives in an ordinary country house with any pretensions to fashion. I suppose the cycle will regain its original favour with fashion, now that the Prince of Wales has taken to it. One hopes that it may induce some inventive courtier to remove its one great flaw, and make it capable of standing alone. When will the motor car come, really and comfortably? Do you live in hopes—as I do—that it may be perfected, at least in time to be the solace of our old age?

Last week being Holy Week, Dublin indulged in no gaiety, the festively disposed had anticipations only to live on. Lady Cadogan, with her sons, was at the Viceregal Lodge, where Lord Cadogan joined her at the end of the week. Lord and Lady Roberts, with their family, are not to return for some weeks to Dublin from Abbeyleix. Several dances will be given in Dublin after Easter, as the "season," which has intervals, does not absolutely come to an end until after the National race meeting at Punchestown. Only there is the exodus from the capital general. The Lord Chief Justice of Ireland reappeared in the hunting field after his severe accident, not to have the season end with disaster. A good seat on the bench and one on the saddle do not often go together. It is characteristic, perhaps, that they should do so in this country of the "horse." Several of our judges have been taking their holidays abroad. Lord Justice FitzGibbon has been in Cairo for a short time, and Mr. Justice Ross in Paris.—Yours ever,

Clare.

What sort of recipes would you like this week? These timbales of whiting with purée of shrimps make a nice entrée for a dinner party, or they may be served as a fish course:—

Pound the flesh of a nice whiting, adding the yolks of two eggs, an ounce of butter, and a tablespoonful of white sauce; season it with salt, pepper, and a pinch of cayenne, and rub all through a hair sieve into a basin. Work the forcemeat with a wooden spoon, adding a gill of cream gradually. Fill seven or eight buttered and decorated dariole moulds with the forcemeat, and press a hole in the centre with the handle of a wooden spoon dipped in hot water. Fill the cavity with purée of shrimps, smooth the forcemeat over with a palette knife dipped in hot water and steam them twenty minutes, but do not allow them to boil. Turn the creams, in two straight rows down a dish, and pour shrimp sauce round. To make the purée:—Pound a gill of picked shrimps with an ounce of butter, adding the yolk of an egg, a little cream, and a very little essence of anchovy; season it with pepper and a squeeze of lemon juice. The bones of the fish should be stewed for the sauce, after which strain it and thicken it with a spoonful of potato flour, add the yolk of an egg, a little cream, salt and pepper to taste, a saltspoonful of essence of anchovy, a squeeze of lemon juice, and a tablespoonful of picked and chopped shrimps.

Clear tomato soup, à la Milanaise, is quite new and really excellent:—

Put the contents of a tin of tomatoes into a stewpan with two whole eggs and 1 lb. of lean beef or veal, previously passed through the sausage-machine; mix it thoroughly together. Add two quarts of good stock, free from grease, and stir it until it is boiling. Season all with six peppercorns, a blade of mace, a bouquet of herbs, a carrot, and an onion. Allow the soup to simmer for two hours, adding a little cold water to make the quantity about two quarts. Then strain it carefully through a cloth. Boil 2 oz. of macaroni in salted water until it is tender. Strain and cut it into tiny rings; add it to the soup at the time of serving. Serve with it grated parmesan on a plate.

These "tri-coloured cakes" are a great novelty, and simply lovely:—

Beat 4 oz. of butter with 4 oz. of sugar until it is a creamy batter, add 4 yolks of eggs, and beat until quite light; mix in 4 oz. of flour, the grated peel of a fresh lemon, and a pinch of baking powder. Spread the mixture on to a greased and papered baking sheet, bake about 20 minutes in a moderate oven, and turn

EAUTIFUL TORQUAY.—The Imperial Hotel has the best position, is the leading hotel in Torquay. Grand climate. Cool in summer, m in winter, and well known as the "Queen of Watering Places."

on to a pastry rack to cool. Now make another sheet in this way. Beat 4 oz. of fine sugar and fresh butter together until creamy, then mix in the whipped whites of 4 eggs, in alternate spoonfuls, with 4 oz. of flour, spread on a greased baking sheet, and bake in the same way. Mix 2 oz. of ground almonds with 4 oz. of sifted icing sugar, the yolk of an egg, a few drops of cochineal and a squeeze of lemon juice, roll the almond paste into a sheet with a little sugar, and place it between the yellow and white cakes. Cut them into neat square pieces. Mix 6 oz. of icing sugar with a table-spoonful of water in a little stewpan, and stir over the fire until just warm, add a very little Maraschino, coat the top and bottom of the cakes with the icing, and sprinkle them with dessicated cocoanut. Arrange the cubes corner to corner on a dessert paper.

These "balloons" are delicious breakfast bread :—

Mix 1 pint of thick cream with 1 pint of Hungarian flour until quite smooth, add a pinch of salt and the yolks of 3 fresh eggs, whip the whites to a stiff froth and mix them last. Bake in small, buttered patty pans, in a brisk oven. When the bread is done split and butter each one. Serve in a napkin very hot.

Ever, dear, your loving cousin, MADGE.

ARISTOCRACY AND EVOLUTION.

A Study of the Rights, the Origin, and the Social Functions of the Wealthier Classes. By W. H. MALLOCK, Author of "Labour and the Popular Welfare," "Classes and Masses," &c.

"He does not envelop the subject in a cloud of philosophic phraseology, he is always lucid and orderly, and he relieves his argument by welcome touches of satire and humour. His last book shows no deficiency in these qualities, and it is also perhaps the most complete and sustained effort of reasoning which he has so far produced."—Literature.

A Cup of Chocolat Suchard accurately prepared, contains all the delicious, soothing, and restorative properties known to exist in Cocoa. Cup for cup, "Chocolat Suchard" is noted for its superiority of flavour and aroma over all other like preparations.

Chocolat Suchard

owes these characteristics not only to the choice materials it is made of, but equally so, perhaps, to the clean and careful methods by which it is uniformly prepared. The recognition of these sterling qualities has led to a largely increased consumption of Chocolat Suchard among the better classes all over the world. Beware of imitations.

All Chocolates, Cocoas and Bonbons bearing the name of Suchard are of the highest quality only.

WEST VIRGINIA & PITTSBURGH RAILROAD COMPANY.

TO THE HOLDERS OF THE FIVE PER CENT. FIRST MORTGAGE GOLD BONDS DATED 1st APRIL, 1890.

The West Virginia and Pittsburgh Railroad Company having failed to provide for the payment of the Coupons of the above-mentioned Bonds, due 1st April, 1898, we desire to give notice to the Bondholders that it is our intention to take immediate steps for the protection of their interests. To this end it is necessary for us to have control of the Bonds, and we accordingly request the holders to deposit their Bonds with us without delay.

In exchange for them we shall issue negotiable certificates (a Stock Exchange quotation for which will be applied for) in terms of an agreement bearing date 1st April, 1898, copies of which and schedules of deposit, may be obtained at our office, on and after 12th April, 1898.

Prompt action is desirable, and in order that we may know to what extent we can represent the Bondholders, Bonds should be deposited with us not later than 1st May, 1898.

BROWN, SHIPLEY & Co.

Founders' Court, London, E.C., 5th April, 1898.

CONVERSION of the FOUR AND A HALF PER CENT. MORTGAGE BOND of the Russian Association for Mutual Credit on Landed Property (Société de Crédit Foncier Mutuel de Russie), into Bonds bearing interest at $3\frac{3}{10}$ per cent., to be issued in conformity with the Ukase of his Majesty the Emperor of Russia and the Official Advertisement of the Russian Ministry of Finance.

Notice is hereby given that Messrs. N. M. ROTHSCHILD & SONS will be prepared to receive, from the 4th to the 25th APRIL next, APPLICATIONS for CONVERSION of the above $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Bonds, on the following conditions:—

The $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Bonds presented for Conversion must have attached to them the coupon due 1/13 July next, and all subsequent coupons, as well as the talon, and every 100 gold roubles of the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Bonds will be converted into 150 roubles $3\frac{3}{10}$ per cent. Bonds, to which will also be attached a coupon due the 1/13 of July next.

The difference in interest between $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and $3\frac{3}{10}$ per cent. for six months will be considered as equivalent to Mks.1.13½ and will be paid to the bondholders in cash at the sight exchange of the day on Berlin.

The deposit of Bonds notified for Conversion during the period allowed may be deferred until May 2nd, upon security being given.

The Bonds presented for Conversion will be stamped as follows:—"Received for Conversion, N. M. Rothschild & Sons, London"—and immediately returned, but without talons or coupon sheets. They will be exchanged for the new $3\frac{3}{10}$ per cent. Bonds at a date to be announced hereafter, but before the 13th July next.

The payment of the above-stated difference of interest will be made at the time of stamping the Bonds.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 998.—DEFINITION OF "SMART SOCIETY."

Lucia (real name and address will be published in due course) £2 2 0

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the Puzzle Editor, Truth Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand; whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 993.

After deliberation more than usually prolonged, the prize in this competition has been awarded to W. Nevermore, whose English rendering of three French stanzas from "Trilby" was printed in Truth puzzle page on February 24.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 996.

The result of this competition will be announced next week, when competition No. 999 is decided.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 999.

It has been impossible to complete the examination of the very numerous lists received for this competition, but it is hoped that the result will be announced next week.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,003.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week to the Competitor who succeeds best

In Writing a Stanza of Four Lines, Two of which Must End in the Words "Jonathan" and "Mexico," and the Other two in Words rhyming with the two in Question.

Competitors would do well to note that rhymes have to be found for the whole words "Jonathan" and "Mexico," not merely for the final syllables "than" and "co." More than one attempt can be sent in by each competitor, and all answers must reach me by the morning of Monday, April 25, at the latest.

Answers to Correspondents.

 This page of Truth goes to press exceptionally early this week in consequence of the Easter Holidays. The answers to Correspondents' queries have, therefore, to be held over until next week.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,000.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

RHYMED ACROSTICS ON "ALFRED THE GREAT" APROPOS TO HIS MILLENARY CELEBRATION.

A ll hail, great Alfred! to our memory dear;
L ong hast thou been best known of English kings,
F or from our earliest years, though never clear
R especting modern history's men and things,
E ver at thought of thee our memory wakes;
D evoured we childhood's lessons with thy cakes.
T hou first of Britain's heroes! well we know
H ow 'gainst invaders thou did'st ply thy bow—
E xpert as butcher more than baker, thou.
G ermans invade us now on every hand;
R ussia and France our statesmanship command;
E ngland in commerce and in fight subsides,
A n England wanting thee again, abides;—
T hy memory! may it wake thy native land!
Guillaumette.

A little tardy—still, not yet too late,
L ong tho' the twice five hundred years gone by (F ame, Alfred, needs no statue. In "The Great"
R esteth a witness that can never die).
E ngland a sculptor's finished work rears high,
D eeming thy birthplace needs his lasting art.
T rue! but in every town thy memory
H as found a fitting frame, in every heart.
E ngland! just now when war clouds dim the sky,
G reatness of mind and purpose fixed like his,
R esolve to act, to us might well apply.
E ngland! that pattern our great Alfred is.
A ttain this end—in marble live his fame,
T hrowing new lustre on the monarch's name.
Malignant.

A ll hail, old King! Time was I loathed your name;
L ong, long ago, in boyhood's happy days;
F or oft at school the master sang your praise,
R equiring me to celebrate your fame.
E 'en then I half admired your conduct game;
D ressed as a peasant, chanting shepherd's lays;
T ending the cakes, whose burn your rank betrays;
H unted by Danes, and scolded by a dame.
E xpiring, now a thousand years, though late,
G ive we our statue, and, with all our might,
R edeem our long neglect, though changed is quite
E nglish opinion. Danes no more we hate;
A nd now no more with Danes our princes fight;
T hey marry Danes, and happy count their fate, Almaviva.

A youngest son of Ethelwulf, said Fame,
L ong shall posterity revere thy name,
F or, Phœnix-like, from Ethelwulfian fires
R ejoicing bards shall praise thee on their lyres.
E mblazoned scrolls shall tell of doughty deeds
D one in thy strength to meet a nation's needs.
T he tyrant's yoke, strange term to British ears,
H as given place, through thee, to happy years
E mployed in pursuits cultured and refined,
G reat blessings that do so enrich the mind.
R emedial thy laws, quite firm, but just,
E ach Briton in them centred all his trust,
A nd pledged pre-destined glory in the toast
T hat Britain's honour ne'er should leave its coast.
Pro Archia.

A lfred the Great, lord of a thousand years,
L ow at thy feet these wreathen rhymes I lay.
F resh as in that fair dawn of England's day
R emains thy glory now; with grateful tears
E ngland regrets thee, and thy name reveres;
D efender of her shores, her foes' dismay,
T rue founder of her wise imperial sway,
H er art, her letters—all that life endears.
E nvy is mute, though ten long cycles lend
G randeur to thee, and swell thy deeds of fame
R ecorded in far annals of our fate;
E ndless thy praise till time itself shall end,
A nd none may ever win a nobler name
T han thine, thou peerless King—Alfred the Great.
W. Nevermore.

A lthough the records of a thousand years
L ight up the noble deeds of England's worth,
F resh as revolving dawn one name appears,
R adiant in glow as at its early birth.
E ngland's first glory, beacon for all time,
D ear to her sons and dreaded by her foes,
T hy skill and courage ruled the battle line,
H urled the invader from our sacred shores,
E ndowed Britannia with an ocean fleet—
G erm of a glory that shall never fade—
R uled with a wand with wisdom's gems replete,
E mpire's arms in freedom's strength arrayed;
A s ages fast receding into ages flow,
T he laurel chaplet still keeps green upon thy brow.
Sceptic.

A lfred, none more deserves the title Great!
L earned, wise, good, brave—preserver of the State.
F ifty-six battles, fought by land and sea,
R estored thy crown and made thy people free.
E ngland commenc'd her course of naval power—
D ebtor to thee for ships the seas to scour,*
T ithings, shires, statutes, twelve men good and true;†
H er parliaments in ev'ry year were two:
E nlighten'd men who sought our friendly shore
G ave Oxford fame it never knew before.
R omance and truth thy name renowned make—
E ach schoolboy knows how Alfred burnt the cake.‡
A better king the world may never see,
T hen let thy millenary honour'd be.§
J. McGrigor Allan.

* Alfred was the founder of the British Navy.

† Alfred composed a body of statutes, instituted trial by jury, and divided the kingdom into shires and tithings.

‡ Alfred took refuge in a herdsman's cottage at Athelney in Somersetshire, where occurred the incident of the burnt cakes.

§ Large orders for millinery are expected from the Ladies' Rational Dress League!

WITH 'ARRY'S COMPLIMENTS TO ALF.

A lf, though underneath the floor
L ain you have years fifty score,
F aith, I drink your health, great King,
R ound your dustbin dance and sing;
E nglishmen, I think, should try
D eeds like yours to magnify;
T imes have changed a bit, you know,
H ero-worship's now the go.
E ngland's grown so very big,
G rabbing lands from heathen Nig;
R obbery is the trade to pay,
E 'en as in your good old day;
A t the game, though, you might see
T ricks to shock your Majesty.
Scorpio.

A lfred Resurgam! that's the latest "boom."
L overs of "Celebrations," now's your chance.
F rom out your purses pour the needful coin,
R oyal Alfred's greatness thus you may enhance.
E ngland's deliverer! fame awaits thee still,
D eath and long years have only been thy gain;
T he country (as no Jubilee is near)
H as now developed "Alfred on the brain."
E ach town which marks thy conflicts with the Danes
G reatly desires to claim thee for its own:
R eleased from cumbrous flesh, there yet remains
E ndless contention having thee for "bone."
A lfred Resurgam! Honour thee they may,
T hough England won't be very keen to pay.
Sybil Ashton.

"A thousand years are but as yesterday!"
L ight up the banquet, let the music swell;
F or he whose kingly valour we would tell
R eigns in our hearts and homes and realms today,
E ach statute wise, whose word is "yea" or "nay"
(D ear to our Britain, where all free things dwell),
T ook root from his good seed, that gently fell
H ere, into ground prepared, and quickening lay.
E ach trumpet-call of "God defend the Right!"
G reets now our ears, because his arm was bold;
R evered his memory, shrined in radiant light,
E ver the story of his life-work told,
A lfred! saint, sage, philosopher, true knight!
T he grandest name old England's annals hold.
Mrs. Buchanan.

A cross the gulf of full a thousand years
L ooks backward lovingly the Motherland,
F rom her old age of honour and command.
R emembering her springtime and its tears.
E nthroned in safety, she no longer hears
D eath-boding war-cry of the Viking band,
T hat often ravaged her ill-guarded strand—
H arassed the shore which now no danger fears.
E arly-begotten offspring of her youth,
G reat elder brother of our island race,
R uler and captain, law-giver and saint,
E stablisher of peace, and tongue of Truth—
A lfred—thy story gratefully we trace
T hrough the far centuries, remote and faint.
Beaumont.

A claim the Saxon King whose life has shed
L ustre succeeding ages can embrace,
"F reedom"—the cause for which he fought and bled—
R emains, as then, the watch-word of his race.
E ach failure firmed his purpose and he stood
D auntless until he bowed the foeman's knee.
T hat tale of glory which was writ in blood
H as taught his sons that, if they dare be free
E 'en as their sire they too must strive and stand
G reat in distress, toil-seeking, scorning rest,
R ejoicing hearts and lives to give their land
E 're foreign foes should strike her sea-girt breast.
A nd they shall hear across the vale of years
T he trump of Alfred sounding in their ears.
Twius.

A down the ages all men call him great;
L earning, through strife and suffering, all his days;
F ought the fierce Danes; after long fights and frays
R epulsed—the King brought order to the State,
E nforced wise laws; plunder and crime t' abate
D id halls of learning found, that he might raise
T he people to the height of his own ways;
H e, the ideal King, in worth and weight,
E ngland owes him much love, for noble deeds;
G reat as a warrior, legislator famed,
R eigning resplendent, in his later years,
E vincing knowledge of his people's needs,
A equired thro' wanderings oft, when poor, unnamed;
T heir woes he knew, and sought to wipe their tears.
Esperanza.

A lfred! sole English monarch called "the Great,"
L ovingly now thy praise we celebrate;
F or through a thousand years resounds thy name,
R ecalling thy last modest wish for fame;
E ven the memory of good service done,
D eeds that have for thy country blessings won;
T hy courage and thy patience long were tried,
H arassed by enemies on every side;
E ncompassed, vanquished, yet thou did'st not yield,
G aining at last full victory on the field:
R eturning days of peace new labours brought,
E ach wrong was righted, the unlearn'd were taught;
A n infant fleet began to guard our coast;
T hen honesty was justly England's boast.
Excelsior.

A ll hail! Great Alfred, king of temporal kings,
L earning's precursor in our native land;
F ull honours to thy fame this era brings,
R emembring him in whose great name there stand
E mancipation, justice, equal rights,
D efeated Dane and Saxon shared together;
T ime doth not pale thy virtues in our sight,
H allowed art, thou whose fame admits no tether.
E ngland must not efface thy memory;
G ood Alfred is enshrined in us for ever;
R esting through ages, thou that made us free,
E ndeared so long, thy country's name ne'er sever.
A lbion's deliv'rer! Saxon, no more slave!
T eacher so wise, so noble, yet true and brave.

Neptune.

A ll honour raise to England's long-since noble dead,
L ike Alfred, monarch never graced the throne;
F or goodness, greatness, wisdom, foemen's direst dread,
R evered he stands of all his peers alone.
E re ray of light illumed the darkness of the past,
D eserted in a shepherd's hut he dwelt;
T here brooding on his country's woes, raised help at last,
H is conquering sword then Danish foemen felt.
E xample rare! the Gospel truths he strove to teach,
G ave equal laws to serf and lord,
R edressed their wrongs, and listened to the plaints of each,
E ffected more by pen than by the sword,
A nd now we reap what an immortal mind has sown,
T hen offer praises high, and all his virtues own.

Culpepper.

A thousand years has Fame thy lustre spread,
L ess three, wherein she'll swift detract instead;
F or none are suffered in these days to rest
R enowned for deeds, unless of proof possest.
E 'en now we learn thou did'st not burn those cakes
D emanding watching. All are myths, mistakes,
T hat hailed thee Oxford's founder. England owes
H er trial courts by jury, meets her foes
E xtraneous with a navy, not through thee;
G rants not thou mad'st her shires' bounds to be!
R eputes but suffer ween too late exhumed;
E arth rests thy bones; Just Heaven thy soul assumed.
A ppeal for cryptic peace to scape all taint,
T RUTH's hero, poet, jurist, soldier, saint!

Robert Martin.

A king was he, hero of much romance;
L awmaker wise and leader bold, by chance
F oredestined all his country's wrongs to right,
R egaining lands subdued by hostile might.
E 'en now his name to English hearts is dear;
D eem it then needless monument to rear
T o one whose memory surely would be green,
H ad twice a thousand years his absence seen.
E ngland, we trust, in all her times of need,
G reat hearts will find—true patriots indeed.
R eady to vanquish, not to crush a foe,
E ven as he who lived long years ago,
A nd sowed the seeds of England's might at sea:
T his to maintain should now our object be.

Woodlands.

A pproach my Muse, and help me sing
L oudest of all the praise of him—
F ounder of laws, both right and good,
R ound whom his steadfast people stood
E ncountering foes and many a pain,
D anes came, went, and came again.
T arnish his reputation if you must,
H omeless—a wanderer, still he's just,
E ngland remembers what you have been.
G reat men have lived, besides this king,
R emember of them, only, what is good,
E nlarge the greatness of the trials they stood;
A final requiem let us sing
T o Alfred, Counsellor and King.

P. P.

A ll hail, Great Alfred, glorious king, how dear to us thy name!
L o! Britain's sons and daughters join to celebrate thy fame.
F ounder of England's Navy: how great our debt to thee!
R eformer, legislator, victor by land and sea!
E ncourager of learning: Oxford would sing thy praise;
D ons one and all would dedicate to thee their choicest lays.
T he heritage that thou did'st leave to be our joy and pride,
H ow jealously we would it guard, an Empire now world-wide!
E ver be this our motto grand: "May Heav'n's light be our guide!"
G reat Britain, thou art destined still great deeds to dare and do,
R est not and think thou hast well done, but to thyself be true;
E ver advance in greatness, deliver the oppress,
A ssist the heavy-laden, succour the sore distrest;
T o find in blessing others thou shalt thyself be blest.

Courage.

A ll hail to thee, our greatest king!
L et Britons now thy praises sing;
F or though the cycle of past ages
R olls stately on through history's pages
E ach reign doth add to thy dear land
D ominion, power, from strand to strand:
T hat power that dares to do what's right,
H urled forward in triumphant might.
E ach craven foe is swept aside,
G reat Britain's power rolls far and wide.
R ighteous in strength, we gaze on high,
E ach voice is raised in clarion cry,
"A lfred the Great, we look to thee!"
T hy monument, a people free.

F. J. Bradley.

A king arose in England, when the wild and cruel Danes
L aid waste the peaceful villages, and slew the Saxon thanes;
F amed Alfred fought his pagan foes on land and on the flood,
R estored the isle to freedom's smile, and sought her greatest good.
E vents have followed fast since then, his realm, still brave and free,
D oth ever praise the king who lit her glory on the sea.
T he hundred ships the Saxon manned to guard the threatened shore
H ave vanished—scattered by the winds of time—for evermore;
E ach clumsy hulk is now replaced by mighty ships, that ride
G igantic, grand, and terrible, our safety and our pride.
R ight royal Alfred, thou whose fame is like a fadeless star,
E nduring through the centuries, a beacon-light afar,
A round the name that knows no blame a wealth of homage clings,
T hy meed, O gallant patriot! thou king of England's kings!

ENTRE NOUS.

THE Royal yachts Victoria and Albert and Osborne, the Trinity House yacht Galatea, and two cruisers are under orders to leave Spithead on Tuesday for Cherbourg, when they will embark the Queen, late in the afternoon on the following day, for conveyance to Portsmouth Harbour. The Queen will dine and sleep on board the Victoria and Albert at Cherbourg on Wednesday, and her Majesty is to cross the Channel on Thursday, arriving at Portsmouth about half-past three o'clock.

The Princess of Wales and Princess Charles of Denmark will come up to Marlborough House from Sandringham for the season either on Friday, the 29th, or on Monday, May 2, according to present arrangements. The Princess did not stay nearly so long at Copenhagen as was originally intended, as she is anxious about Princess Victoria, who has been stopping during the last three weeks at Cromer, at Lord Suffield's villa, for the benefit of her health.

The wedding of Prince Christian of Denmark and the Duchess Alexandrina of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, which is to take place at Cannes, has been postponed until Tuesday next, so the Prince of Wales could not stay to attend it. The young couple, who will be very rich, are to live principally at the Chateau of Sorgenfri, a fine place, with beautiful gardens and beech woods all round, which is about ten miles from Copenhagen.

With reference to a paragraph in Truth of April 7, I have been requested to contradict the statement that a separation between the Grand Duke and the Grand Duchess of Hesse has been in process of arrangement. In view of the quarter from which this request comes, I cannot hesitate to publish the contradiction; although I notice that the original statement has been repeated in an Exchange Company's telegram, which was widely circulated in the daily Press on Saturday and Sunday last.

I read last week, in a notice from Nice, that the King of the Belgians had actually been seen to wipe the dust off his boots with a handkerchief. What would his flunkey have had him do? Leave the dust on the boots, or order a courtier to lick it off?

Lord and Lady Cadogan, with some members of their family, spent Easter quietly at the Viceregal Lodge, Several small dinner-parties were given during the week. Lord and Lady Cadogan entertaining the Duke of Abercorn, Lord Londonderry, and other representative Irish landlords whom the Landlord Convention had brought to Dublin for their annual meeting. The weather was very bad in Ireland, and especially in the neighbourhood of Dublin at the beginning of the week, tempered neither to the shorn lamb nor to the pleasure seekers in holiday garb. Some of the race meetings prevalent at this season experienced the most disastrous weather. The downpour of rain was persistent all day at the Fairy House races, notwithstanding which Lord and Lady Cadogan heroically fulfilled the viceregal duty of attending them, accompanied by a large suite in attendance. On Saturday, the 14th Hussars were lucky in having a beautiful day for their races at Mullaboden in Kildare. A Viceregal party was present, and all the elect of the county and of other counties. A band played in the enclosure, and military hospitality was dispensed. The sunshine made open-air pastime pleasant, and gave the first opportunity of the season to spring costumes.

Since Easter, Dublin has been crowded with Irish landlords from all parts of the country, holding conference regarding their own special affairs, and the coming Local Government Bill. This week the Spring Cattle and Dog Show of the Royal Dublin Society is being held at Ball's Bridge, and is drawing crowds to the capital. Lord and Lady Cadogan, with a Viceregal party, will attend the Cattle Show in state. On Tuesday, Lord and Lady Cadogan dine with the Chancellor and Lady Ashbourne, who afterwards give a large reception—"To have the honour of meeting their Excellencies"—at their residence in Merrion-square.

Sir John Arnott's career in Ireland is one more example of the fact that self-help can make a fortune in that country as well as in any other. A Glasgow man, he went over to Ireland, and, by industry and enterprise, and by taking advantage of opportunities open to all who chose to take them, became very wealthy. To the gift of making money Sir John Arnott added that of spending it well. He was liberal, generous, and an active philanthropist. He made his money in Ireland, and spent it there chiefly, a practice which, if more generally followed, might make the country less liable to periods of distress.

The late Lord Exeter was a most popular man, and everybody who knew him liked and esteemed him. In the neighbourhood of Stamford, where he was best known, he was an immense favourite among all classes, and his genial manner and his true kindness of heart caused every one in the district to regard him as a personal friend. It will be impossible to fill his place in the public life of North Northamptonshire, with which county he had been closely and usefully connected ever since he left Oxford. Lord Exeter was actively concerned in every department of local business, and in all good works he was foremost among his neighbours. He was a confirmed Tory, but he was as popular among the Liberals as with his own party. Lord Exeter (then Lord Burghley) replaced the late Mr. Ward Hunt as member for North Northamptonshire in 1877, and he sat for the county until his succession to the peerage, always heading the poll (there were then two members for the division), except in 1880, when his cousin, Mr. Robert Spencer, gained the first place by twenty votes. He was a generous and considerate landlord, although it is well known that he had exceptional difficulties to overcome when he succeeded to the Burghley estates.

Shortly after Lord Exeter came of age he aroused the indignation of many farmers, and still more of their wives and daughters, by expressing the opinion that it would be well if those females devoted their attention to the dairy and kitchen, instead of wasting their time in piano playing, novel reading, and useless fancy work. Lord Exeter's views have been abundantly justified of late years, and many farmers who abused him in the fat days of a quarter of a century ago must in these lean times bitterly lament that his advice was not taken.

The Burghley estates are very extensive, and Lady Exeter inherited a large property from her father, but the peerage is a poor one, although it would have been hugely opulent but for the obstinate fatuity of the grandfather of the late Marquis. He was a dull, pompous man, and was as furiously opposed to railways as that famous Duke of Hamilton (Beckford's son-in-law) who was called by Lord Brougham, "the very Duke of Dukes." When the plans of the Great Northern Railway were originally drawn the main line was intended to run through Stamford, and that town was to have been the Crewe or Swindon of the company. Lord Exeter, however, agitated so vigorously against this proposal that is was decided to divert the course of the line, the result being that Stamford was left in its original seclusion, and the depot was established at Peterborough. Of course the line would have run through Lord Exeter's property, and a great deal of his land at Stamford would have been taken for the railway sidings and buildings, and the profit to his family would have been prodigious. A few years later Lord Exeter was howled at by his neighbours for having ruined them, and the trade of Stamford was rapidly declining, so he was obliged to make a railway at his own expense in order to connect that town with the main line at Essendine, and this he worked at a fearful loss until it was taken over by the Great Northern on terms which were not favourable to the vendor. In order to pay for the private railway Lord Exeter consummated his blunders by selling most of his London property, which of course was not nearly so valuable then as it is now.

Fortune, however, having got tired of persecuting the elder branch of the Cecil family, the three brothers of the late Lord Exeter all married rich heiresses, and one of his sisters is the wife of Lord Barnard, the heir to the bulk of the vast property of the last Duke of Cleveland.

The late Mr. Milner-Gibson, who died so unexpectedly at Monte Carlo, and was cremated on Easter-eve at Woking, was all his life a man of very broad and enlightened views, and a consistent adherent of the Liberal Party, which will greatly miss his support in the Eye Division of Suffolk. He was a man of most genial and open-handed disposition, and was greatly beloved and respected in the neighbourhood of his residence at Saxmundham. He was very well known at Monte Carlo, where he had wintered for several seasons past, and he was a considerable shareholder in the Casino.

A foreign resident at Cairo wishes me to make known the peculiar and unhappy predicament in which he has been placed in regard to his nationality. By birth he is a Swiss; but some years ago he became a naturalised British subject in South Australia. Then he went to live at Cairo, where he was registered at the British Consulate as a naturalised British subject. After that he returned for a time to South Australia, and now he has once more taken up his residence in Cairo. His second application for registration at the British Consulate has been refused, on the ground that the naturalisation which he was granted in South Australia did not extend beyond that colony. This is, indeed, borne out by the certificate itself, which simply conferred upon him "all the rights and capacities within the aforesaid province (South Australia) of a natural born British subject;" and it was presumably only through an oversight that he was registered at the British Consulate upon his first arrival in Egypt.

Finding himself thus shorn of his British citizenship, my correspondent supposed that he could revert to his original status as a subject of the Swiss Republic. The Swiss have no Consul at Cairo, but are afforded the protection of either the French or the German Consuls. It being necessary for him to get his signature to some documents from Adelaide legally authenticated, he applied as a Swiss for the requisite assistance both at the French and the German Consulates. The Consuls knew, however, that he had been naturalised as a British subject, and for this reason neither of them would recognise that he had any claim to their services. Applications elsewhere were equally fruitless—in fact, this unfortunate gentleman seems to have become a sort of international derelict. He is a British subject in South Australia, but in the rest of the world he is neither British nor Swiss, nor anything else, and it is nobody's business to look after his interests. Considering that it was through taking the oath of allegiance to the Queen that he has been landed in this difficulty, it would be only fair and courteous for the British Consul to take him under his wing.

Mr. Radcliffe Cooke, M.P., is a wit, a Tory, and a Jingo. I see that his son has passed second out of the Britannia. I congratulate him, with his patriotic views, in having devoted his son to the practical business of defending and extending our Empire, as Hamilcar did the young Hannibal. If all Jingo M.P.s were, in default of being themselves soldiers and sailors, to give this Carthaginian proof of their military zeal, I should have more respect for them. But they seem to prefer the example of the Roman Senate, and, whilst leaving others to fight, sit awaiting the advent of the Gauls on their Parliamentary benches, secure in the conviction that, whatever may occur, it is not likely that the Gauls will make their way to the Palace of Westminster.

The following letter is of so much importance to travellers in the Mediterranean and the Levant, especially ladies, that I hasten to publish it. Before now I have ventilated in TRUTH the objections widely entertained to the system of communicating doors between hotel bedrooms; but let us hope that nothing so bad as this is to be found in English hotels. I have heard of a lady who always insisted on hanging a railway rug over a chair in front of the keyhole in her bedroom door as a safeguard against the attentions of "Peeping Toms," but a keyhole affords but limited means of observation by comparison with what is here described :—

It may interest many of your readers to notice that in most hotels on the Continent, Malta, Tangiers, Cairo, &c., whenever there is a door communicating with the next bedroom, you will find in the corners of each panel a small hole neatly bored, through which you can watch all the movements of the occupant of the adjoining room. They are all similar, and in the corners of the panels.

In Malta I pointed it out to a young lady who was taking a room, and who was shocked until I showed her how to stop the holes up with soap.

In Constantinople the landlord assured me with indignation that it was not so in his hotel. I twisted up some spills of papers and left them inserted in the holes for his inspection.

Your readers can amuse themselves by verifying these statements, and, by stopping with soap all but one or two holes, they may have some sport by just attracting attention by loud splashing in a bath, then cautiously from one side approaching the open hole and making a sudden plunge through it with a steel knitting-needle or other convenient implement. They will be able afterwards to notice who has an eye bandaged

Mr. Charles Locke Eastlake has retired from the office of Keeper and Secretary of the National Gallery, and the Treasury have seized the occasion to effect a very considerable reduction in the salary of this post. Mr. Eastlake received £875 a year, but his successor, Mr. H. H. Turner, is cut down to £350, rising in the course of seven years to £500. The office, in fact, has been brought down to a level with that of Keeper of the Tate Gallery at Millbank. Considering the great extent and inestimable importance of the collection in Trafalgar-square, many people will consider that the laudable but decidedly capricious zeal of the Treasury for economy is in this case somewhat misplaced.

Speculators in rare books may learn a lesson from the history of the books and manuscripts, "the property of Harold Baillie Weaver, Esq.," which were sold at Christie's the other day. The collection of 528 lots was purchased in 1895 for upwards of £25,000 at the Phillips, Gennadius, and Stuart sales; but it now realised only £5,527! The six folio Shakespeares (duplicates of the second and fourth), which three years ago cost upwards of £4,000, now fetched £268!

Reference has once or twice been made in TRUTH to competitions run in connection with a publication called Golden Sovereigns. People who go in for these competitions receive a notification that they have won a prize, which will be forwarded to them on receipt of one year's subscription to the paper (4s. 4d.). As the articles given as prizes are utter rubbish, what the successful competitors really receive is the privilege of buying this paper at a penny a week for twelve months. It seems, however, that even this condition is not properly carried out, for I have just heard of a case in which a successful competitor finds that after he has received the paper for a few weeks it has been no longer sent to him. As already mentioned in TRUTH, there is some occult connection between Golden Sovereigns and the A. T. Hale Company, which runs Nicholson's Aural Institute and the free ear-drum swindle; and to all appearance the two enterprises are of the same character.

A great many residents in the neighbourhood of Dulwich who have sons at the College have been much inconvenienced this Easter by the fact that the College holidays only commenced on April 13, i.e., the Wednesday in Easter week, which made it impossible for parents to go away for Easter without leaving their boys behind. As Dulwich is a large educational centre, where many people with large families fix themselves for the sake of sending their children to the College, the inconvenience is widely felt. It is aggravated by the fact that, in the High School for Girls at the same place, the holidays commenced on April 1, and end on April 26, so that boys and girls in the same family attending the two schools are at home together for less than a fortnight.

MAJOR HOWE & CO., LTD.—Fashionable BOOTS and SHOES.—16, Coventry-st., W.; 60, Strand, W.C.; 81, Gracechurch-st.; and 13, Queen Victoria-st., London. "Note Addresses." (Repairs.)

The latter grievance is not confined to Dulwich. Parents who have children of either sex at different schools are often much inconvenienced by the different dates at which holidays are fixed, especially at Easter. Why cannot schoolmasters, like other professions and trades, agree on some common closing time? The reason given by the Dulwich College authorities for deferring the commencement of the Easter holidays till the Wednesday in Easter week, is said to be the necessity of keeping the terms of uniform length. A week more or less, however, cannot make much difference, especially a week which contains two days like Good Friday and Easter Monday.

After all, the inconvenience caused in schools by the movable character of the Easter holidays is a trifle compared to that which the erratic nature of this festival causes in other departments of life. I always used myself to be in favour of fixing Easter at a definite date by Act of Parliament. But when I was reminded that a similar proposal was the cause of the original schism between the Eastern and Western Churches, my courage failed me, and I ceased to advocate the change. I still think, however, privately, that to fix Easter some time in the latter part of April would be a good thing—even at the cost of an ecclesiastical schism.

The decision of the Oxford Convocation, by a small majority, to establish a third set of pass examinations has been severely criticised in the University, for any multiplication of examinations (of which there are already an inordinate number) is a most serious evil. This objectionable change is really a mere job of some of the College tutors who principally devote themselves to pass work.

I recently called attention to the abuse of memorials. Here is an instance to hand. The Reverend Henry Lyte wrote some hymns, which appear to have found favour. He is dead, but fifty years ago he was Vicar of Brixham. The parish church of Brixham is being rebuilt. More than £2,000 has been collected, but £4,000 is still required. Therefore those who like the hymns of the Reverend Henry Lyte are requested to provide this £4,000, as the present incumbent "longs to see the fabric of the noble church completed, which is now being built." I have no objection to the noble church being completed. But what has this to do with Mr. Lyte, or Mr. Lyte's hymns? At most a subscription might have been started to place a memorial brass plate in the church when completed.

The rectory of Eastham, Herefordshire, which is now vacant, is the richest living in Bishop Percival's diocese, the net income being over £900 a year with residence, and the parish is by no means a large one. The advowson belonged to the late incumbent, and the living is in the gift of his trustees.

The Master of the Temple (Canon Ainger) has been appointed to preach at the Chapel Royal, St. James's Palace, next Sunday.

There are not many of the Anglican clergy who have worked harder than the late Canon Nash, who commenced his parochial career under the well-known Canon Christopher at Oxford, and stayed at St. Aldate's for eight years. Canon Nash laboured with zeal and success in several large parishes until 1889, when the late Lord Forester presented to him the pleasant living of Little Wenlock, where he was much beloved by all classes of his parishioners and neighbours.

It looks as if there had been some exaggeration respecting the number of experienced clergymen of the Church of England who cannot obtain employment. Dr. Thackeray asserted that there are 6,000 priests eager for work. The matter has been investigated by a committee of the Lower House of the Canterbury Convocation, with the result that the number of unemployed clergymen in the Southern Province is found to be 2,000, of whom only seventy-three desire work as assistant curates, while but five are unemployed because they object to the present position of curates. It may be, however, that Dr. Thackeray will find some fallacy in these statistics.

On the question of redistribution of Church endowments, one of my clerical readers asks how endowments which were at one time sufficient for a population of ten millions can be adequate for one of thirty millions, the suggestion being that the increase of population alone must necessitate an increase in the Church revenues. The answer is that the Church revenues, though not the endowments, have increased more or less with the population. The endowments are mainly appropriated to the rural districts, whereas the increase of population has taken place in the towns. It is a significant fact, to which I have often called attention, that the Church of England in the great towns stands on the footing of a voluntary rather than an endowed Church, and that it is precisely here where the Church is most healthy and energetic. Vast though the increase of our towns has been, churches and clergymen have multiplied in proportion, and even in the most poverty-stricken urban districts you will find more money available for the maintenance of Church and clergy than in the most prosperous country parishes. The inference which I draw from this, is that the Church would get on just as well, and probably better, if it had no endowments at all.

"Hôtel Burlington," at Sunny Boscombe. (200 rooms). Every luxury. Delightful grounds. Magnificent golf links. Sea-water baths. Moderate charges.—Bournemouth East Station.

Anyhow, the fact remains that, in the majority of the endowed parishes—that is to say, in the country—the population has declined, and is still declining; and when we hear so much about the depreciation of clerical incomes, this fact ought to be remembered at the same time. In point of fact, the two results both proceed from the same cause, viz., the decay of agriculture. The point which I started the other day was that the proper way to deal with the poverty of the country clergy is to redistribute the endowments and the work, and the increase of population in the towns has clearly no bearing on this point.

It appears that the "Three Lynn Boys," whose collection of shillings on behalf of the Lynn branch of the Y.M.C.A. has several times been referred to in TRUTH, are still at work as actively as ever. They state on one of their last postcards that "kind friends all over the country have enabled us to pay in over 2,000 shillings"; but as they also mention that 10,000 shillings is the amount which they have made up their minds to collect, it would seem that in all these years of cadging they have only got one-fifth of the way through their task. It is some comfort to know that out of all the thousands of people who have been pestered with circulars in the names of these children only 2,000 have been found sufficiently foolish to rise to the bait; but it seems probable that a good many of their shillings have gone to the printers and the Postmaster-General instead of the Y.M.C.A.

It really does seem a monstrous absurdity that, while lotteries are forbidden by law on this side of St. George's Channel, they should be carried on in Ireland, not only without disguise, but under the highest auspices. Tickets are now being circulated for a "ballot for £100," to be carried out at a fête at the Rotunda, Dublin, in June next, in aid of the new schools of the Carmelite Church, and the tickets contain the announcement—obviously as a guarantee of the bona-fides of the proceeding—that "the drawing will take place under the supervision of the Right Honourable Daniel Tallon, Alderman Pile, High Sheriff of Dublin, Sir John Power, the Right Honourable Joseph Mead, LL.D., P.C., James Talbot Power, Esq., D.L., and Count Plunkett." All these gentlemen would, of course, be liable to fine and imprisonment if they conducted the ballot over here. Lotteries may be right, or they may be wrong, but they cannot be both, and there ought to be one law on this point for the whole of the United Kingdom.

"Staff Corps" sends me 5s. towards the deficit of the Toy Fund and 5s. for the London Spectacle Mission Society.

DUYSEN PIANOS are the most superb of all modern Instruments. They stand absolutely unrivalled for beauty of tone, touch, & finish. A consummate success in small grands.—LLOYD'S, 24, Mount-street, Grosvenor-square, W.

It seems to be generally admitted by those who condemn the Staff work in the Tirah Campaign that the shortcomings of the Staff cannot be justly attributed to the lack of Staff College training among the Staff officers. "There is no evidence whatever," says one officer writing to me on this subject, "that the Staff College men did any better than the rest;" and he goes on to remark that "a clever man who has never been through a course at Camberley is worth more on the Staff than a dull one with 'P.S.C.' to his name." As a British taxpayer I should uncommonly like to know whether this view is generally regarded as sound, for if it is, the sooner the Staff College is abolished the better. To begin with, men entering the Staff College have to produce such an array of testimonials to their character and professional attainments that it seems difficult to understand how a hopeless duffer could get into the Staff College at all, much less come out of it with "P.S.C." to his name. But if it is possible even for the smartest man without special training to make as good a Staff officer as the stupidest P.S.C., well, then we may as well save the money that we are spending at present on training Staff officers, and leave men to pick up the requisite knowledge by the light of Nature.

The following growl of a regimental officer who has been through the Tirah Campaign was not written for publication, but, I think, deserves it. It is taken from a private letter addressed to a brother officer in England, and it echoes a very similar utterance of an officer in last week's TRUTH:—

> The Tirah Campaign shows that regimental soldiering leads to nothing. We company officers "flat-foot it," have the very hardest physical labour, and all responsibility in this hill fighting, for a company, when once launched, has to carry on upon its own initiative. But we get no thanks and no rewards. Every company officer you speak to is utterly sick at the way dispatches are filled at the end of the campaign with the names of staff and orderly officers "shot out" from home and other places, whilst no regimental officer is by any chance mentioned unless he gets his unit into a mess, has a disaster of some sort, and extricates himself fairly well. For those who avoid the mess there is no reward at all. . . . .

In reference to a letter published in TRUTH of the 7th instant in which it was stated that at the capture of the Sanpagha Pass General Westmacott's Brigade fired into General Gaselee's, an officer of the 36th Sikhs, who was present on the occasion, writes to say that the statement is utterly false. I am very glad to hear this, and I hope it may be taken that there was no foundation of any kind for the story. As I remarked when publishing the letter, it came from an officer who must be taken to have had authority for the statement before making it, but I trust that this denial will dispose of it permanently.

The following is a good instance of the lax way in which regulations are sometimes interpreted by officers in high positions. The quarters of the General Officer Commanding a district which shall be nameless have lately been under repair, and the Army Works Department have been in possession of a part of the house.

During the first part of the time the General was on leave, and absent with his family, but his servants remained in the house. He himself returned, as did his family later on, before the completion of the work. Strange though it may appear, I believe there is no doubt that lodging allowance has been drawn for a considerable part, if not all of this time. From the nature of the certificate which has to be signed before such allowance is paid, it seems clear that the General's attention can never have been drawn to the precise terms of that document; and the incident shows clearly that steps should be taken to ensure greater strictness in the execution of such certificates.

The Officer Commanding a British regiment in Burmah sends me the following interesting document recently received by him. It is specially interesting, because it shows plainly that native tradesmen are not above offering backsheesh to military authorities, and although the honour of a Commanding Officer may be above suspicion, an offer of a substantial sum in rupees might prove a more serious temptation lower down in the military scale:—

To Lieutenant-Colonel ——

Sir,—I most respectfully beg to inform you that I have already given applications for tailoring work. My rates are less than your present tailor-master.

Hoping you will kindly oblige me with the same, and for the same purpose I will give you Rs.500.—I remain, sir, your humble petitioner,

An officer sends the following experience apropos of the remarks in last week's Truth on vouchers for cab hire:—

I was sent on court-martial duty to a station about ninety miles from my own. There was no railway. I drove fourteen miles in one tonga—changed to another for about twenty miles—then into a canal boat—then to another tonga, and finally did the last thirty miles in a bullock-cart. On the return journey I did the same. So that when I sent in my claim for travelling expenses I had to attach ten receipts. As most of the travelling was by night, it was practically impossible to get receipts from all the different drivers and boatmen. All I did was—on getting back—to write out the various amounts on slips of paper and tell my "butler" to get them signed. He brought them me shortly afterwards, all duly receipted in (apparently) different names. I got my money.

In insisting on vouchers under circumstances such as these, the Government only lays itself out to be imposed upon If it cannot trust to the honour of "officers and gentlemen" to send in correct returns of their out-of-pocket expenses, why does it not work out for itself the expense which will be incurred, and make a reasonable allowance to cover it? Almost everybody in business occasionally has to send employees on journeys by cab, rail, and omnibus, but I doubt if it has ever occurred to any private employer to ask for vouchers for expenses incurred under such circumstances.

Some startling statements have been made by special correspondents in the Soudan respecting the boots of the troops. The Daily Mail reports that at the conclusion of the great march of the Camerons, Warwicks, and Lincolns to the Atbara:—

Hundreds of men were all but barefoot; the soles peeled off, and instead of a solid double sole, revealed a layer of shoddy packing, sandwiched between two thin slices of leather.

Coming from a writer who signs his name, and must have seen what he reports, these statements cannot possibly be challenged. The march in question was one of 118 miles, and the troops have only been in the country a few weeks. When one remembers that on the success of this march might have depended the whole result of the campaign, and that the success of the march must have been jeopardised by the wholesale failure of shoe leather, it seems time that an example was made of the contractor who supplied those boots.

I have been much struck by a complaint addressed to me respecting a sentence recently imposed on a man in the Medical Staff Corps at Capetown. The man acts as a groom to a medical officer. At about 7 a.m., while engaged in cleaning his master's horse, another private, employed as storeman, brought him a loaf of bread, asking him to take it to his master for inspection, in order that the bread might be passed before issue to the patients. The groom refused, on the ground that his horse's head was wet, and he could not leave it. The storeman then took the bread, with the same request, to the servant of a second officer, who complied. The bread was passed by this second officer, who thereupon ordered the first private to be made a prisoner, and he was subsequently brought up and awarded five days' "C.B." for neglect of duty.

There are several points in this case which deserve notice. In the first instance, I believe I am right in saying that it is the duty of the orderly medical officer of the day to attend at the stores for the purpose of inspecting and passing the bread, and he would have to report in the ordinary course that he had performed this duty. What he reported on the day in question I do not know, but the duty was certainly not performed. If any one, therefore, was guilty of neglect of duty, it would seem to have been the orderly officer of the day, rather than his groom. At the time when the groom was asked to take the loaf to him, this officer was in bed. It was no part of the groom's duty to take the bread to him there, and no one in authority gave him any order to do so. It is, therefore, difficult to see in what way the man was guilty even of a technical breach of duty in declining to comply.

Again, apart from the injustice and irregularity of the man's punishment, the incident discloses a most improper and irregular manner of carrying out a most important duty. What can be more disgusting than that a groom, engaged in washing a horse, should be told to leave that work and take a loaf of bread in his hands to an officer's bedroom, in order that the officer may there break the loaf and examine it while in bed, and then presumably return it to take its place as part of the patients' food for the day? If this is the usual course of things at this hospital, it is time that the procedure was overhauled.

Some months ago, notice was drawn in Truth to the fact that in February, 1897, litters for the conveyance of sick and wounded soldiers on mules were abolished by an Army order, and that no new arrangement had been provided to take their place. It seems desirable to mention again that down to the present time no step whatever has been taken to remedy this oversight. During the late campaign on the Indian frontier, the proper transport of the wounded was one of the greatest difficulties which hampered the operations, and this fact should serve to remind the War Office that at present the Army is practically without any organised system of carrying wounded and sick men in countries unprovided with roads.

Here is a further batch of "Tommy's" grievances, all, I think, deserving of attention in their way:—

Royal Engineers, Aldershot.—The R.E. guard-room at Aldershot contains seven beds, which, on the Box and Cox principle, I suppose, afford accommodation for fourteen men. The whole strength of the guard, however, is three N.C.O.s, twenty-seven men, and one trumpeter—thirty-one in all—out of whom twenty-two N.C.O.s and men are in the guard-room at a time. Eight of these twenty-two are, therefore, without any place to rest, except the forms and the floor, and they usually take the latter alternative. This is a very scandalous arrangement, which ought not to be allowed to continue.

18th Company, Western Division R.A., Colaba.—It is a long-standing grievance among the Royal Artillery at Colaba that they are not allowed to use the road which other troops use in going to and from the town. The route from which they are excluded is not only the shorter, but it has the advantage of a tramway. This matter was noticed in TRUTH over two years ago, and no excuse or justification for it has ever been offered, so that it seems about time that the artillerymen were allowed the same rights of way as the other troops.

1st Battalion The King's Own Yorkshire Light Infantry, Dublin.—A private in this battalion with thirteen years' service and no crime against him in the whole time, was the other day awarded ten days' hard labour by the C.O. for his first "drunk." Under the circumstances the sentence seems a very harsh one. No one wants to encourage drunkenness in the Army, but to give a man ten days' hard labour for getting drunk after thirteen years' rigid sobriety seems rather calculated to discourage temperance.

Depot, Royal Dublin Fusiliers, Naas.—A colour-sergeant here completed three years' Depot duty some two months back. It appears to be the second tour of Depot duty that he has enjoyed in the course of eleven years' service, and it would therefore seem to be about time that he was relieved. As two drafts from the Depot have joined the home battalion since his three years expired, it appears to be necessary to call attention to these facts in the interests of other men who have a right to return to the Depot.

13th Hussars, Dublin.—It appears to be the rule in this regiment for every man who comes out of hospital after more than fourteen days there to be sent for a time to rejoin the recruits in the riding school. This practice is, so far as I can learn, peculiar to the 13th Hussars, and the justification for it as a general rule is not obvious. There are no doubt cases in which a man gets into hospital through his own fault. But that does not justify the infliction of punishment indiscriminately upon every man who has been in hospital for a fortnight.

Station Hospital, Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Among a batch of growls from this quarter I find one to the effect that patients whilst still detained in bed are required to turn out three or four times a week and scrub the floors. If this is the general rule, it is a matter which certainly requires looking into.

Medical Staff Corps, Chester.—A private M.S.C. from the Station Hospital, Chester, has been seen of late every Thursday taking round parcels of fish received from Grimsby to the quarters of certain officers. Further inquiry shows that this same private is employed as a store-man, an orderly-man, and a messenger, and that in the latter capacity he has to take messages and run errands at almost all hours in the evening. It would be interesting to know whether he has any work to do as a ward-orderly, and, if so, when he does it.

Attention was called in TRUTH a couple of months back to certain serious statements made by an English firm of brewers at Esquimalt, in regard to a demand made upon them by a petty officer in charge of the Naval canteen at that station. The statement was to the effect that, on the brewers declining to comply with this individual's request for payment of 3d. per gallon to him, the contract was given to a rival firm of brewers (Germans) at the same place. I have since received some figures which throw a surprising light upon the demands of the canteen officer. It appears that the consumption of beer at the Naval canteen at Esquimalt amounts to 600 gallons per week, and 3d. per gallon on this would amount to £390 per annum. In addition to this, I am told that a profit of nearly 4d. per gallon—or over £500 a year—is made by supplying reputed measure in place of Imperial measure. Here we have illegitimate profits to the amount of nearly £900 a year, all of which, must, in the long run, come out of the pockets of the sailors. In addition to this, there are commissions and profits on the sale of cheese, bread, and other articles.

Let me again impress upon the Admiralty the necessity of giving this matter their attention. I do not mean to suggest that the whole of the profit above indicated goes into the pocket of the petty officer in charge of the canteen. Some portion of it is presumably applied to various working expenses; but the whole of it cannot possibly be absorbed under that head. The £390 a year which comes from the brewers, however, appears to have been asked for and paid as a personal perquisite of the petty officer in charge. I do not suppose it is accounted for to the canteen funds. It is a monstrous thing that any petty officer should be allowed to pocket commissions to this extent, and it is the duty of the Admiralty to put a stop to such proceedings at once. There is, I believe, some sort of committee in charge of the canteen, but it must be totally worthless for any practical purpose if it winks at such proceedings as the above.

In reply to a question asked in TRUTH the other day respecting the payment of contributors to Ashore and Afloat, a publication of the Royal Humane Society, I have had a letter from Miss Agnes Weston. The letter is not intended for publication; but having published the query, I think it is only right to mention that Miss Weston informs me that she has inquired into the matter, and that she has communicated with the only contributor she can find who has not been paid promptly. No doubt the communication will be of a satisfactory nature. Miss Weston remarks that the contributions from the lower deck, elicited by the offer referred to, involve a good deal of work to the editor of the publication, and that the offer is intended more for the benefit of the readers than for that of the paper, which seems very probable. The publication is, of course, not a paying concern, and it appears that 20,000 copies a month are distributed gratis in the Service, so that the editor and proprietors are certainly entitled to indulgent criticism.

There is a most absurd and (in more than one sense) shortsighted condition in the Board of Trade examination for officers of the mercantile marine. Besides a colour test, every applicant for a certificate has to undergo a vision test in which he is called upon to distinguish letters half an inch in size from a distance of about sixteen feet. Such a test is useless, for at sea an officer is never required under any circumstances to distinguish such small objects at so short a distance. It is indeed worse than useless, for it involves the rejection of men who, though they cannot pick out half-inch letters at a distance of sixteen feet, can see larger objects at long distances perfectly well, while it passes others who can comply with the former requirement but who do not possess the more important qualification of long sight. The test seems in fact to be the exact opposite of what is needed, by the practical work of the men upon whom it is imposed.

I hear that there is some dissatisfaction among the Royal Irish Constabulary in Dublin with the management of the sergeants' mess. The point seems to be that the mess has a handsome balance of cash in hand, which the members would like to use in improving the furniture, and particularly in providing a billiard-table. At present there is only a French bagatelle-board. The men are evidently afraid to ventilate their own views on the question, for I have had a communication on the subject from an outsider who has mixed with them. How the mess is managed I do not know, but it ought to be modelled on the lines of a sergeants' mess in the Army, and if it were, the men would soon have a billiard-table, or any other article that they have the money to purchase.

The petition to the Board of Trade from the local authorities north of the Thames against the Gas Light and Coke Company's recent increase of the price of gas deserves Mr. Ritchie's best attention. Here is a corporation which manufactures gas on a scale which, I suppose, is approached nowhere else in the world, and reaps corresponding benefits in the direction of economical working and the advantageous treatment and disposal of the by-products. Besides all this, its sales must be increasing annually by leaps and bounds — yet this company suddenly puts up its prices 20 per cent. without offering any shadow of reason for the rise. We are now presented with the anomaly that gas is sold at a handsome profit on the south side of the Thames at 2s. 3d. per thousand, while on the north the price is 3s. What is required in London is, first, such a revision of the sliding scale as will reduce the profits of the monopolists to something not exceeding 5 per cent.; and, secondly, the transference of the whole undertaking to the hands of a public authority.

My last reference to the overcowding of the trams at Southampton brings me the information from a local correspondent that the cars and 'buses are licensed by the Watch Committee of the Corporation, but that they have, under the general or local Acts, no power to limit the numbers carried. There seems to be no reason, however, why the Corporation should not pass the necessary by-laws if it were so disposed. I understand that some time back such by-laws were drafted, but, for some reason or other, were never proceeded with. Probably the reason was that the Tramway Company possesses sufficient influence in the Corporation to stop the movement.

In the interests of the public it is to be hoped that the Commissioner of Police will have noted two coroner's inquiries held last week on victims to omnibus racing in the London streets. This practice—dangerous at any time—is next door to murder in the present crowded state of all the principal thoroughfares, and the sooner vigorous measures are adopted for its repression, the better it will be for everybody. Another discomforting circumstance elicited by these inquiries, which directly affects the safety of foot-passengers, was the fact that the accident occurred through the omnibus passing on its wrong side of the refuge in the middle of the road, off which the unfortunate victim had just stepped. Nearly every one considers that it is only necessary to be cautious of traffic coming in the right direction, but if drivers are to be allowed to take either side of a refuge at their own discretion, the terrors of crossing our principal streets will be considerably enhanced.

A tourist in the North intending the other day to cycle from Newcastle to Morpeth, wished to send on his luggage by train. The distance is about fourteen miles. He found that the charge for his trunk was 3s. 6d., for his dressing bag 1s. 6d., and for his fishing rod 1s., total 6s. This is a pretty good instance of the monstrous scale on which railway goods rates are fixed. In the case of personal effects, such charges are easily defeated by sending the goods as passenger's luggage. In the above case the cyclist adopted this course, with the result that the company took both himself—a matter of some thirteen stone—and his luggage for a 1s. 2d. third-class ticket. But that does not make it any the less absurd that the company should charge five times this amount for sending the luggage without the man.

The Exmouth District Council continues to interpret its duties as a sanitary authority in a very free and easy fashion. Last week a discussion took place on the case of a firm of builders who had admittedly contravened the building by-laws in the construction of some houses. A majority of the members were more concerned to excuse the builders than to enforce the by-laws. It was affirmed that every builder in the town had "done the same thing time after time," and the Inspector was charged with unfairness in presenting a report against this firm. Building by-laws at Exmouth seem, in fact, to have been made only to be broken, and it was decided that no action should be taken in this case, though a sort of pious opinion was expressed that in future all builders should strictly comply with the regulations. I should be more surprised at the conduct of the Council did I not understand that the question of the by-laws is one which affects more or less closely the private interests and enterprises of several of the members.

By the way, I have had several letters from Exmouth suggesting that the recent dismissal of the Surveyor, though another reason was assigned for it, was really due to the fact that he has had the courage to point out the sanitary shortcomings of the town and to do his duty without regard to the wishes or prejudices of Councillors. The character of the Council assuredly renders it by no means improbable that this is the case, for the members have before now shown themselves to be very "arbitrary gents."

In reference to the statement that no mention of the actice of kissing the book in taking an oath can be found rlier than the latter part of the seventeenth century, veral correspondents have called my attention to an lusion to the subject in Shakespeare. This is to be und in Act ii., scene 2, of the "The Tempest." Probably hen Mr. F. A. Stringer made the statement in the Times, was referring to authentic records of legal procedure. is clear, however, from the passage in Shakespeare that ssing the book was a recognised adjunct to an oath early one hundred years before the date which he gave.

A fine of £50, with the alternative of three months' nprisonment, is by no means too severe a punishment to inflicted for the offence (which is scandalously common) sending diseased meat to the London market. It is ell known in East Anglia that a recent outbreak of a alady at a farm in that district originated with the offal a beast, the flesh of which had been sent to market for le; and there is no reason to believe that this filthy and ngerous meat was ever traced. It would be well, deed, if magistrates would invariably inflict sentences of nprisonment in cases of this kind.

When Mr. Kensit next comes before a police magis-ate I would recommend that functionary to order an nquiry into the state of his mind. Some years ago this ndividual was publisher, if I remember rightly, to e Vigilance Association, an organisation of the self-ghteous who desired to mend other people's morals. I lled attention to the fact that, while waging war on vice his character of an officer of the Vigilance Association, ensit was engaged in pandering to the vicious by deluging ondon with grossly obscene literature, under the guise of bels on Roman Catholicism. The result of the disclosures TRUTH was that Kensit's connection with the Vigilants as promptly severed. I hardly supposed at that time that ensit was really desirous of ministering to the prurient hile filling his own pocket as a purveyor of literary filth. regarded him rather as a fanatic, so blinded by sectarian bite and rancour that he was incapable of judging the ue nature and tendency of the garbage in which e dealt. He was apparently incapable of realising that e was himself doing what his Vigilance employers were anded together to prevent. On that view, it was a lear case of mental aberration, resulting from religious naticism.

Kensit's recent proceedings appear to be of the same lass. Nonconformists and other ultra-Protestants have een writing to the papers to disavow any sympathy with ensit's proceedings. They may well do so, for such roceedings bring Protestantism into disrepute. It is also erfectly certain that Kensit has given numerous itualistic churches a splendid advertisement, which will evitably increase their congregations, and lead many into he Ritualistic fold. Here again, therefore, the man's acts are totally antagonistic to his professions. If he seriously believes that any good end is to be gained by going from church to church disturbing the devotions of those whose views he does not hold, it is a clear proof that his mind is deranged.

Many people think that religion is a secondary object with him, and that love of notoriety is the mainspring of his action. There may be an element of truth in this. Doubtless he is suffering from "swelled head," like most of those who conceive that they have a special mission to rescue the world from its sins. But this is consistent, rather than inconsistent, with the theory of insanity. The worst thing to do with such a man is to prosecute him, and on no account should he be allowed to go to prison, for it is probably his dearest wish to become a martyr to the faith, and to gratify his desire will only aggravate the mischief. A few weeks' detention and proper treatment in a lunatic hospital is the most humane course, and would probably work a complete cure.

Personally I have not much more affection than Mr. Kensit for the extreme forms of Anglican Ritualism, which always strike me as a queer sort of bogus or shoddy Romanism, without the raison d'être of the original article. But every man's religion is his own affair (so long as he does not unduly obtrude it on others), and if anybody feels the better, morally or intellectually, for florid and elaborate religious ritual, I should as soon think of depriving him of that satisfaction as of interfering with the books he reads or the clothes he wears. There is a parson at Colchester, the Rev. C. C. Naters, who has just announced in his parish magazine that, as he finds some of the parishioners do not like the services at present provided, and as he is anxious to satisfy all, he is prepared to arrange special services for the benefit of the dissentients, if they will kindly meet and confer with him on the subject. There is a true catholicity about this offer, and the result may be awaited with interest. Shall we hear next of the reverend gentleman celebrating high mass in the morning, arrayed in all the vestments of the Ritualistic wardrobe, and preaching in a black gown in the evening from the top-story of a "three-decker," with the clerk snoring peacefully below?

A very ingenuous confession is made by Mr. John F. Eastwood, Chairman of the Kingston County Bench. The Borough Bench at Kingston generally inflicts a fine of 5s. for the offence of allowing an unmuzzled dog to be at large, whereas the County Bench visits the same offence with a fine of 10s. or 12s. 6d. A correspondent of a local paper asked for an explanation of the extraordinary difference in the practice of the two Benches, and Mr. Eastwood has supplied it. He states that a few months ago a meeting of the county magistrates and the mayors of boroughs was held to consider the desirability of equalising the fines for similar offences throughout the county of Surrey. It was decided that in the case of unmuzzled dogs, 10s.

Surplice Shirts for evening wear, with pique fronts, /6, 10/6 each, made to measure.—Sampson & Co., Shirt Tailors, 68, 270, Oxford-street, London, W. Price lists forwarded.

including costs would be a suitable fine; and the Kingston County Bench, Mr. Eastwood proudly proclaims, "has loyally followed the recommendation of the meeting." When the defendant does not appear, an extra half-crown is added to the regulation fine.

This worthy magistrate's sense of humour must be as defective as his sense of justice, or he would never have given the public this interesting glimpse behind the scenes. I have heard of one place where there is said to be a graduated scale of fines in cases of unmuzzled dogs—half-a-crown if the defendant attends and pleads guilty, 5s. if he is absent, and 7s. 6d. if he offers any defence. But the magistrates of that place—it is a seaside town—are too discreet to boast about their little arrangement as Mr. Eastwood does about his. It does not seem to have occurred to him and his colleagues that such a system is ridiculously and hopelessly unjust. No account whatever is taken of the merits of the case or the position of the defendant. The fine of 10s. falls alike on the poor man to whom it means a week's wages and on the rich man to whom it is an unconsidered trifle; and the man whose dog has temporarily escaped into the street through no fault of his own is placed in the same boat as the offender who wilfully takes his dog out without a muzzle. If punishment is to be meted out in this fashion, the Great Unpaid might just as well be replaced by automatic machines.

According to Mr. Drew, the Coroner for West London, "Professor" D'Odiardi, of the "Notting Hill Gate Free Hospital," has had a narrow escape from an indictment for manslaughter. The Coroner expressed this view at an inquest last week on a late patient at the "hospital," whom D'Odiardi had treated for one complaint, and who had died of another. The complaint of which the man died was shown by the medical evidence to be one unsuitable for treatment by the D'Odiardi electrical process; and there can be no doubt that the Coroner was right in his remark that if the death had occurred while the patient was under the electrical treatment, the consequences would have been unpleasant for "the Professor."

Reference has been made in TRUTH on previous occasions to the Silver-street Electrical Hospital and the Professor who runs it. He is a voluble gentleman, with a great deal to say in defence of his treatment, and the disinterestedness of his operations, from which he professes to derive no profit; and I know that in referring to the late inquest I expose myself to a voluminous reply from him, and possibly equally voluminous communications from misguided persons who believe in him. I may as well say, therefore, at once, that I shall publish nothing in defence of the "Professor" or his "hospital." He may be the greatest medical genius of the age, but he is, in plain English, a quack, and the verdict of the jury last week that he ought not to apply his treatment except under qualified medical supervision is not open to question. If the law were what it should be, it would be impossible for him to treat patients at all—even in a "free hospital."

A remarkable disclosure was incidentally made by D'Odiardi in the course of this case. He has treated, it seems, "no less than nine members of a distinguished Cabinet Minister's family—Mr. Joseph Chamberlain." He did not say in so many words that he had electrified the distinguished Cabinet Minister himself, but I have little doubt that such is the case. Long have we wondered at and deplored the sad change in the Right Honourable gentleman. D'Odiardi explains everything. Evidently an excess of electricity in the system brings on attacks of Jingoism. Perhaps some other professor may be able to reverse the process.

In regard to two sentences at Somerset Quarter Sessions, I have received further information which causes me to somewhat modify the opinion I expressed last week. It appears that the prisoner Gray, charged with assaulting a girl, was only a youth of seventeen, that the case was not marked by the brutality so common in the same class of offence, that the culprit received a severe thrashing at the time, and that (though offered bail) he was in prison for three months before his trial. In these circumstances the sentence could not be considered unreasonably lenient. With reference to the girl Stickland, who was committed to gaol for three months for attempting to commit suicide, it seems that the prison doctor advised that it would be unsafe to liberate her on her own recognisances, and that there was apparently no friend or philanthropic agency to take care of her. The Magistrates, moreover, directed that if at the end of a month or two months her condition was such as to render it safe to release her, application should be made to the Home Secretary for that purpose.

It was certainly desirable that this wretched girl should not be set at liberty in the state of mind in which she appeared at the Sessions. But while I am ready to give the Bench credit for acting from the best of motives, it appears to me that a gaol was about the most unsuitable place to which this poor creature could be sent. Prison life is decidedly not calculated to restore her mental balance, and if, in the absence of relatives or friends, prison life is the only remedy the magistrates have power to prescribe in such a case, then the law requires amendment. Committal for a time to a workhouse, or, if the state of the prisoner justified it, to an asylum, would be better. I may add that the circumstances of this particular case do not affect one point which I mentioned last week—namely, that attempts to commit suicide are generally punished far more severely at Somerset Quarter Sessions than elsewhere.

In my Legal Pillory this week, the most interesting exposition of Justices' justice comes from Langport. Two farm lads are fined £6 each and costs for carrying a gun without a licence and trespassing in search of game—the capon having been lent to them by their employer, and the "trespass" being upon land in his occupation. As the farmer himself paid the fines, the lads escaped the alternative period of imprisonment which they would otherwise have had to undergo; but that does not make the imposition of such outrageously heavy penalties any the less monstrous. Scarcely less monstrous were the penalties inflicted by the same Shallows upon two other youths for the enormity of playing pitch and toss. Had they been grown-up men, and amused themselves by beating their wives, they would have had no more to pay. A comparison of these sentences and others on the same side of the list with those imposed in the opposite column for offences of violence and cruelty will be found highly instructive :—

Birmingham Police - court. Before Messrs. Colmore, and G. Langye, and Dr. Warden. Patrick Green, charged with assaulting Wm. Dickenson. Without any provocation defendant struck complainant a violent blow on the head, knocking him down, and then kicked him on the face. Fined 10s. and costs.

Lawford's Gate Police-court. Before the Duke of Beaufort, Messrs. G. H. Pope, A. Shipley, and Kossuth Robinson. Wm. Jones, charged with assaulting Jesse Fudge, an old man. Defendant struck the old man on the head with the iron forks of a rake, cutting and bruising him. The Bench said it was a serious and cowardly case of assault. Defendant might have killed the complainant. Fined 10s., including costs.

Newport (Mon.) Police-court. Anthony Lee, charged with assaulting his wife. He went home under the influence of drink and assaulted his wife, who called in a policeman. In the presence of the officer, defendant knocked the woman down and struck her several times in the face, and he was in the act of kicking her when he was arrested. One of his children was dying in the house at the time. Fined 21s. or one month.

Ashbourn Petty Sessions. Before Mr. H. C. Okeover and other justices. Wm. Bowler, charged with assaulting his wife by kicking her on the leg. She had to be treated by a doctor. Fined 10s. and costs and bound over.

Barnsley Police-court. Fredk. Davies, charged with cruelty to a horse by working it whilst in an unfit condition. The animal had two large raw wounds on the shoulders, and was utterly unfit for work. The Bench said it was a very bad case. Fined 30s. and costs.

Birmingham Police - court. Before the same magistrates. Edward George Cotterill, charged with stealing a loaf and a pig's hough. Six weeks.

Accrington Police-court. Before Alderman Smith and Mr. T. Birtwisle. John Anderton, charged with stealing a pair of boots. Fourteen days.

Langport Petty Sessions. Before Mr. Vincent Stuckey and Mr. C. L. Eastlake. Robert Cox and Frank Wheadon, labouring youths, charged with carrying a gun without a licence and also with trespassing in search of game on land in the occupation of Henry Vigar. The lads were in the employ of Mr. Vigar, who explained that he lent them the gun, and who subsequently paid the fines. Fined £5 each, including costs, for the first offence, and £1 each, with costs in addition, for the second offence.

Langport Petty Sessions. Herbert Richards and John Tilly, two youths, charged with playing pitch and toss on a Sunday at Curry Rivel. The Chairman said he was afraid they were rather a lawless lot at Curry Rivel, and did not fear man or God. Richards fined £1 and costs, Tilly 10s. and costs. One of them asked for time to pay, and said he had not the money. The Chairman: Then you will go to prison.

Newmarket Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. R. W. King, W. W. de la Rue, and C. E. Hammond. Leonard Pike, labourer, charged with trespassing in search of game on Newmarket Heath. Fined £1.

Tenbury Police-court. Before Messrs. G R. Godson and J. Smith. Richard Price, charged with stealing two eggs. Fourteen days.

Brierley Hill Police - court. Before Mr. N. C. A. Neville. Isaiah Peate, charged with assaulting Lydia Glover. Defendant knocked her down and badly assaulted her. Fined 10s. and costs.

Selly Oak Police - court. Before Messrs. Elliott, Nettlefold, T. R. Bayliss, and Boston. Edward Redman, charged with assaulting Samuel Wills. Defendant knocked complainant down, and seizing his thumb with his teeth, bit it to the bone, tearing away the flesh and the nail. Fined 10s. and costs.

Gosport Police-court. Before Admiral Field, Colonel C. M. Longmore, Colonel E. L. Rodney, Messrs. E. Lapthorn, B. Nicholson, and G. Cooke. Charles Newman, charged with assaulting Sarah Ann Parish. He threw a bottle at her, and it smashed on her nose, causing injuries for which she had to seek surgical treatment. The nose was cut right through. Fined 5s. and 8s. 6d. costs.

Romford Petty Sessions. Before Mr. Henry Joslin and other magistrates. Alfred Charles Knight and Reuben Day, labourers, charged with stealing a bushel of potatoes from a farm. Fourteen days each.

Tiverton Petty Sessions. Before Major Gardner, Messrs. C. J. Cruwys, N. Chichester, T. C. Daniel, and W. J. Llewellyn. Charles Coles, trapper, charged with setting spring traps in other than rabbit holes for the purpose of killing ground game. Fined £2.

Stafford Borough Police-court. Before Mr. B. P. Wright and Mr. A. P. Brookfield. Charles Bates, a pauper, charged with absconding from the workhouse. One month.

Maidenhead Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. H. R. Burrows, E. R. Lovegrove, and J. W. Walker. Wm. Parker, charged with stealing a potted fern. Twenty-one days.

Robertstown Petty Sessions. Patrick Judge, charged with cruelty to a donkey. The animal was tied behind a cart with a rope round its neck and dragged along the road on its side. Defendant's excuse was that the donkey refused to walk. Fined 3s. and 1s. 6d. costs.

Mr. W. Bagshaw, J.P., has written to me in reference to two cases at Batley Police-court, which figured in my Legal Pillory last week. In the first case a man convicted of being drunk and riotous, and of assaulting two policemen, was fined 2s. 6d. and costs on each charge. As to this, Mr. Bagshaw mentions that the defendant was a retired soldier of good character, that the assault was "more technical than real," and that the total amount of the penalties was 24s. The newspaper report was to the effect that the defendant had acted like a madman, and kicked both officers on the legs and body; but taking Mr. Bagshaw's version of the affair, the treatment of this offender was still strikingly lenient in comparison with that accorded to the prisoner in the second case. In that case a man was sent to gaol for ten days for the so-called crime of sleeping out in the open air and having no visible means of subsistence. Mr. Bagshaw informs me that this outcast had 120 previous convictions against him. In my judgment that fact does not make the sentence a bit the less scandalous. Whatever he may have done in the past, the man on this occasion had done nothing whatever which called for punishment. If he was simply punished again because he had been punished before, then I can only say that the justice of the Batley justices is of a rather worse quality than I originally supposed.

The irrepressible Isaac Gordon played his usual part in a case at the Isle of Wight Bankruptcy Court the other day. It seemed that the debtor applied for a loan to "W. Wallis," of 66, Great Russell-street, W.C.—one of Isaac's numerous aliases—and by return he was favoured with bank-notes for £50 and a request for his signature to a promissory note for £70. A less enterprising usurer would hesitate to part with the money until he got the security, but Gordon finds that though not without an occasional risk of loss, this sort of confidence trick is in the long run very successful. The actual handling of the bank-notes disposes a man to agree to exorbitant terms of repayment which he might otherwise refuse to entertain. It was so in this instance, and the debtor paid back £70 for the £50 he had received, and also £35 for a second loan of £25. It is true that he fell behind with the repayment of a third loan, but that was not until Gordon had squeezed out of him considerably more than he had ever advanced, so that the bloodsucker was at no loss on the three transactions.

The threatening letter which he addressed to this victim when an instalment became overdue was in Gordon's best style. Writing as "Wallis," he tells the wretched borrower that he will not stand any nonsense or humbug, that he is not going "to be done or sat on," that his victim will not get "a grain of pity or consideration at his hands," but that, unless he pays up immediately, he (Gordon) will be "down upon him like a ton of bricks with the utmost rigour of the law," and "costs will be piled on to the maximum penny possible." After these amiable promises, he winds up:—

> Please do not address me as "Dear Mr. Wallis," which is objectionable, as I do not want your friendship, and I object to a man of your type addressing me in this fashion.

This is a truly delightful touch. As well might a wolf renounce the "friendship" of the lamb he is devouring.

Apropos of D. Jay's statement before the Money-lending Committee, that he could always trust to the honour of his clients, no matter what laws Parliament might pass to limit the rate of interest, there is a maxim attributed to the late John Day of Danebury, which I am told has never appeared in print. It was "Honest John's" opinion that you should "Beware of three things—the kick of a horse, the bite of a dog, and a gentleman's word without his handwriting." On the same principle a gentleman's handwriting, if it possessed no binding force in law, would not seem to be worth very much.

By the way, a clerical error in an article published last week in TRUTH on usurers, makes me suggest equity powers being granted to the courts of law in all cases where the interest on a bill is above two per cent. It ought to have been ten per cent. My main object in writing the article was to call attention to the system of blackmailing relatives of young men, more or less impecunious themselves. A young man borrows money on a bill at usurious interest, and he gets some other young man, perhaps a little less impecunious than himself, to be his security. When the bill comes due the usurer threatens either to make the young man bankrupt, or to come down on the backer of the bill. His relatives, therefore, often pay, the real security in fact being their mistaken idea that this is to the advantage of the lad, whereas this usually opens the door to further extravagance, for the money-lender knows that he can count on further payments from the relatives if fresh bills are put in circulation.

Another trick of a money-lender is to lend money to clerks. The clerk ruins himself in paying interest to avert the evil day, when his employer learns what has been going on. A year or two ago I published, at the request of a Director of the Bank of England, a circular addressed to the clerks at that bank. Here, too, there ought to be some legal scheme elaborated to put an end to the blackmailing of the money-lender.

The Society for the Promotion of Home Industry, referred to in last week's TRUTH as carrying on business at 21, Sarsfeld-road, Balham, appears to be another nom de guerre of Mr. Coleman, of Old Queen-street, Westminster, the home employment dodger. The same "Society" is also sending out its circulars from 31, Palace-terrace, Fulham, which was mentioned in TRUTH some months ago as the address of one of Coleman's agents. By way, I presume, of impressing the intended victim with an idea of the vast ramifications of Coleman's business, those who approach the Society at Fulham are requested to address their envelopes "The Manageress, C Department, 31, Palace-terrace." The facts given in last week's TRUTH respecting the crotchet work doyley trick carried on from the Fulham address should be sufficient warning to the unwary against dealing with Coleman at any of his addresses or under any of his disguises.

The man Chubb-Jackson, whose "rise and progress" in the charity-mongering profession were recently detailed in these columns, has just been in the hands of the police at Shaftesbury, but, I regret to add, has eluded the guardians of the law. He seems to have been cadging round that neighbourhood, and was arrested for obtaining money under false pretences; but inquiries having shown that he had two "homes" with some children in them, the police seem to have felt that it was impossible to press for a conviction, and the charge was withdrawn. The statement of the superintendent who prosecuted was, however, interesting:—

> The prisoner was supposed to have a home at Hadlow, near Tonbridge, in Kent, but the superintendent of police there did not speak very highly of him. He (Superintendent Elford) also wrote to Ryde, where the prisoner stated he had another establishment. The police there stated that there were two or three children in the home there. At the home in Kent the prisoner's mother lived, and there was one child there.

Two or three children in one establishment, and one child in another, are, therefore, in the eye of the law, a sufficient stock-in-trade to justify a philanthropic adventurer in collecting money from house to house all over the South of England, and rendering no account whatever of the use it is put to. No better proof could be given of the need of some amendment of the law for the benefit of these gentry.

It is mentioned incidentally that Chubb-Jackson, when arrested, "was attired in a clerical dress." So that this artful dodger, who was two years ago put, out of charity, in charge of an empty house in St. John's Wood, and at the same time supplemented his income by keeping a coffee-stall in a neighbouring street, is now posing as a minister of some religious denomination unknown. In anything but the legal sense of the term, this would in itself be regarded as a "false pretence." I trust that the police in other places will not be disheartened by the miscarriage of justice at Shaftesbury, but will do their best to stop Chubb-Jackson's game wherever he shows himself. If he cannot be convicted of "false pretences," cannot he be run in as a mendicant, or dealt with as a rogue and vagabond?

Here is a choice specimen of the consummate impudence of the gentry who live by tricking servant girls into buying their goods at back doors, on the instalment system. A gentleman at Altrincham found that one of his servants had been swindled in the usual way by an agent of Hibbins & Co., having been offered a watch and chain on the representation that she could keep them for a month, and return them at the end of that time if she did not like them, and being asked at the same time to write her name and address on a piece of paper, without being told that this was an order form to which she was affixing her signature. On these facts coming to the knowledge of the master of the house, and finding also that the girl was paying 45s. for goods of the value of about 18s., he wrote and told Hibbins & Co. that the girl, under his advice, would not acknowledge the contract, and calling on them to take away the goods. Here is Hibbins & Co.'s answer:—

From Hibbins & Co.,
Manufacturers, Publishers, and Importers,
4, Eton-street,
Richmond, London.

To Mr. —— Altrincham.

April 12, 1898.

Sir,—We are in receipt of yours of the 9th, and we accept your letter, and place the same value upon it as your knowledge of jewellery would lead us to believe by the assessed value you have placed upon the same. You will allow us, considering we have served the public since 1849, to be the best judges as to the value of the goods, and must remind you that we, under no circumstances, will tolerate any interference by you, as our account is with Mary T—— and not with H. H. B——.

Your letter has caused us some amusement, as it is quite evident you consider it an outrage that your servant should have the privilege of buying goods which she considered she required at the time of purchase and felt she was in a position to pay for. In reference to our travellers calling, as they are fully furnished with the necessary licence for the same, we should advise you to be very careful in what steps you take, as even the humble hawker has his proper protection. You will pardon us in suggesting that, in future, you turn your attention to the tea and coffee trade, and leave the jewellery to those who have made it a life study. We are returning the watch and chain, and must request you to hand them back to the owner (M. T——) from whom we hold a legal signed contract undertaking to purchase articles, and, under this agreement, the first payment becomes due on the 16th inst., and, failing the receipt of same, we shall take the necessary proceedings to enforce the written contract.—We are, yours respectfully, Hibbins & Co.

P.S.—Messrs. Hibbins can only answer in future business correspondence from H. B—— when he has opened a ledger account with us.

Where Hibbins & Co. have been serving the public since 1849, and in what capacity, I do not know. They were formerly, according to their own account, in business at Forest Hill. On June 24 last, attention was called to their proceedings in Truth in connection with a case in which they had sold a servant girl a watch, worth probably less than £1, for £3 15s., and, on the watch being returned at the instance of the girl's mistress, they made efforts to get at the girl in another situation in order to enforce the contract. It will be seen that in their letter Hibbins & Co. imply that their touts are furnished with hawkers' licences. It does not follow that this is so because Hibbins & Co. suggest it. But, if such is the case, the sooner the licences are revoked the better.

The recent article in Truth on the faith-healing and fee-grabbing of the Christian Scientists has brought me several letters from people who have had experience of this novel sect. All confirm very strongly the opinions expressed in my article. So far as my evidence goes, I should say that the Christian Scientists have not as yet done much evil from a medical point of view, simply because the majority of their "patients" are people who have nothing whatever the matter with them, unless in their own imaginations. But many authentic stories could be told of weak-minded people who have fallen, together with their cheque books, under the influence of the faith-healers, to the great distress of their friends. In fact, the Christian Science propaganda seems to be chiefly directed at present to relieving patients of their cash rather than their ailments.

It was remarked in my article that "the cash requisite for the maintenance of the temple and the priestesses is derived solely from the fees paid by patients for Christian Science treatment, or for initiation into the mysteries of metaphysical healing." This, it would seem, does not fully cover all the sources of revenue, as I hear of converts being induced to pay annual subscriptions for the maintenance of the meeting-house or church in Bryanston-street. One lady, who, during the absence of her husband in India, fell under the influence of Mrs. Field-King, was induced to put her name down for a subscription of £16 a year. Those who have visited the Bryanston-street tabernacle describe the performances, or services, as being attended by a large number of well-dressed and, apparently, wealthy people, and if they all subscribed on the same scale as the lady above mentioned, it is not surprising that Mrs. Field-King and her colleagues are in very flourishing circumstances. Another additional piece of information is that the fee for "treatment by correspondence" is a preliminary guinea, followed by a guinea a week as long as the correspondence continued. The whole thing seems to be one of the most audacious pieces of imposture that have ever been put before the public, and it is astonishing that any considerable number of educated people should lend themselves to it.

My friend Mr. Smith, the Harlequin of Stroud Green-road, is advertising his latest £35 free competition by postal circulars. I heard the other day from Mr. Sell that, in consequence of the disclosures in Mr. Smith's interview with my representative, he (Mr. Sell) had declined to take any more of the Harlequin's advertisements—a decision which is to his credit. Probably this decision has rather upset the Harlequin's little game, and he is accordingly seeking his victims by post rather than through the columns of the newspapers. He seems to be sending out his circulars somewhat carelessly, for I have had one sent on to me which had not been stamped, and for which the lucky recipient had consequently to pay a penny—a circumstance which naturally did not inspire him with any kindly feelings towards the Stroud Green Harlequin.

It is a good illustration of the way in which addresses are obtained by gentry of the Harlequin class for their nefarious purposes, that one of these circulars was actually sent to a servant girl at Durham, the envelope bearing not only the girl's name, but that of her mistress also. It may be that this girl's name and address had been published in connection with some other competition, or it may be that it had been placed on some of the lists of competitors which are hawked about for the use of the Smiths and others engaged in this business. I heard the other day that some of the employees in newspaper offices where competitions are run do a good business in disposing of the names and addresses of competitors.

Strange, indeed, are the devices to which tradesmen have recourse in order to get round the Lottery Acts. There is an advertisement going about at present in the name of the "J. D. Company," of Ormond House, Great Trinity-lane, E.C., offering £2,000 in prizes to purchasers of a dentifrice, which they are placing on the market. The inducement to buy is that every other shilling box will contain a coupon entitling the holder to a share in prizes to the above value. It seems that every coupon is numbered, and the J. D. Company, from whom I have made inquiries on the subject, keep a register, in which the prizes they propose to give are entered against these numbers. Large numbers of the coupons, however, merely entitle the holder to buy other articles from the company at reduced rates. Thus one coupon which I have in my possession carries with it the privilege of buying a 5s. box of soap for 3s. As the box of soap only contains three cakes, the value of this privilege appears open to question. I am assured that the soap is of a very high quality. It certainly ought to be, and I should think that those who buy soap at this price must be extremely sparing in the use of it. Some of the prizes, however, appear to be of real value, and if they are distributed on the principle above mentioned, the whole thing is clearly a lottery, pure and simple.

In view of a paragraph in the Bournemouth Visitors' Directory, I feel obliged to allude again to the recent dispute between Mr. E. S. Mostyn Pryce and the Committee of the Royal Victoria Hospital at Bournemouth, concerning the question whether Mr. Pryce's governess, a lady enjoying a salary of £40 a year, with her board and lodging, was a proper person to receive the benefits of a medical charity. When I first dealt with the matter, I mentioned a report that the local papers had been prevented from publishing a statement of the case by the threat of legal proceedings. To this Mr. Pryce in his letter to me replied that the local Press "civilly agreed with him that so personal a correspondence should not be published without mutual consent." The editor of the Directory now writes:—

> So far as we are concerned, that statement is absolutely misleading. We never "agreed"—civilly or otherwise—to any such course. When appealed to—some weeks before the correspondence was sent to us from the Hospital Secretary—we were told that the letters contained nothing of any public interest; and the only assurance we gave was that if there was nothing of public interest nothing would be published. We had not, of course, at that time seen the letters. When they were sent to us we saw at once that there was a matter of very great public interest—dealing with the important question of the management of the hospital and its finances, and we placed practically the whole correspondence before our readers, withholding, however, the name of one of the writers, in deference, as already stated, to his own protest. Then came a letter threatening us that should the correspondence in question be published in any future issue, or should the writer be either mentioned by name or clearly described in connection with the matter, he would place the publication in the hands of his solicitors, "in view of the usual steps against the Editor." We have not given further publication to the correspondence. . . .

It would seem from this that my original statement on the subject was more accurate than Mr. Mostyn Pryce's subsequent explanation. That fact adds to the satisfaction I feel at having given the affair the publicity which it deserved, but which it did not obtain in the local newspapers.

The advices received from Trinidad since my reference to the matter last week show that the Legislative Council decided, on the proposition of the Government, that only 1,200 Indian coolies should be imported this year instead of the 2,276 for whom the sugar-planters had applied. This reduction caused much wailing and gnashing of teeth among the planters; but as a matter of fact it is only by a scandalous disregard of the law for the protection of indentured immigrants that they are to get even so many as 1,200. As I have previously explained, the law provides that no coolies shall be allotted to any estate on which less than the starvation wage of sixpence a day has been paid for such labour during the preceding year. Much to the annoyance of the functionary who is called the Protector of Immigrants, but who apparently would be more fittingly described as the advocate of the employers, it leaked out during the debate that if this law as to a minimum wage were observed, only 417 coolies could be obtained this year.

This system of State-aided coolie immigration to the West Indies was bad enough at its best. Now that the safeguards for securing the immigrants a living wage and humane treatment are ignored it is an absolute disgrace to the Empire. In Trinidad there is plenty of free labour to be had, if the planters are willing to pay a fair price for it. But they want labourers who can be dealt with like slaves; and it is to supply this want that the Government of the colony, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Colonies, continues to import those shiploads of coolies.

The reports from Sierra Leone that have been appearing in the daily papers during the past few days confirm in every detail the information given in TRUTH a fortnight ago. It is clear that the insurrection of the natives of the hinterland has been brought about by the oppressive and high-handed conduct of our official representatives in the colony. The European traders and colonists were strongly opposed to the imposition of the hut tax, and warned the Governor (Sir F. Cardew) of the trouble which would inevitably arise from any attempt to levy it. It was furthermore urged that if such a tax were to be insisted upon, it should at any rate be reduced to sixpence or a shilling per hut, the proposed charge of five shillings being preposterously excessive. Sir F. Cardew is, however, a very self-opinionated official. He seems to hold that considerations of reason or expediency need not be taken into account in dealing with niggers; and so the advice and remonstrances of the traders and the appeals and protests of the native chiefs were all contemptuously disregarded.

The responsibility of the Governor for what has happened is strikingly shown in the statement published by Mr. James D. Marcus, who has had factories at Freetown, for many years, and who speaks with exceptional authority respecting, not only European, but native feeling. Some thirty chiefs from the interior went to Freetown, and had an interview with the Governor. They told him that their people absolutely could not pay the hut tax. His reply was that the tax was an accomplished fact, and that he would not alter it. Mr. Marcus continues:—

> The chiefs came to my house and asked me to intercede with the Governor for them. They said their people could not pay the tax, and, furthermore, they found that there was no house or land tax in force on the whole Sierra Leone Peninsula, where some of the houses were worth £2,000 or £3,000, whilst their best was not worth £5, yet they in the Protectorate were called upon to pay a 5s. tax. This they said they considered unjust. I waited on the Governor and gave him the chiefs' views, but his Excellency said the matter was closed, and he intended the hut tax to be insisted upon. I asked the Governor not to consider me presuming, but I was sure that serious trouble would arise and that the trade would be stopped. His Excellency's reply was that he punished people who made trouble. After this the trouble commenced.

The situation appears to have been made worse by the hasty and indiscreet conduct of the British Commissioner at Port Lokko. The Commissioner listened to the representations of a chief named Sorie Bunkey, that he could get the hut tax paid if five other chiefs were arrested and he became king at Port Lokko. The five chiefs were accordingly arrested, and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment, and Sorie Bunkey was crowned King by the Commissioner—a good illustration of the way in which monarchs are made in Africa. This particular potentate had a very brief reign. His appointment and the imprisonment of the other chiefs aggravated the hostility towards us which the tax had aroused, and one of the first results was that poor Sorie Bunkey had his throat cut.

With characteristic optimism the Colonial Office professes to hope that the rising of the natives has been "practically suppressed." Judging from all the reports from independent sources at Sierra Leone, this is the very reverse of the truth. The correspondent of the Standard at Freetown describes the reverses which have been sustained in the interior by the British troops, declares that so far Bey Burie—a powerful chief, who was especially incensed at the selection of Sorie Bunkey as King—has had the best of the fighting, and adds that the position is becoming more and more critical. There seems to be a general opinion that the insurrection will not easily be quelled unless the obnoxious tax is withdrawn or modified. It ought never to have been imposed, and it can be removed now without any loss of revenue, inasmuch as most of the huts on which it was to be collected have already been burned down, and any prolongation of the disturbances will entail the destruction of the remainder, while all trade with the interior is, of course, brought to a standstill. Not only should the tax be withdrawn, but the officials who have so wantonly provoked our latest little war should be recalled and replaced by men of more tact and judgment.

It is very kind of some Irish gentleman to give me an opportunity of publishing the following sample of Irish logic and Unionist manners. I have given facts in regard to the Grand Juries of Clare and Cork which speak for themselves. The writer of this letter evidently thinks that if he can testify that another Grand Jury is above suspicion he has disposed of the other two cases—a truly Irish piece of reasoning. My correspondent had better address his arguments to the present Unionist Government, who are proposing to abolish the Grand Juries, and who seem to be as equally wrong as I am in regard to the value of the sacred institutions. Another interesting and equally Irish point in the letter is the assertion that "we always got on splendidly" before the days of Gladstone and Parnell, as though Ireland had only become a "distressful country" during the last five-and-twenty years. If the "Demon of Agitation" has disappeared, his disappearance singularly synchronises with the alliance between the Nationalists and the Gladstonian Party, but that again is a fact which the logical mind of an Irish Unionist can hardly be expected to recognise:—

> SIR,—You are perfectly wrong about the Grand Jury system in Ireland, as you are about most Irish things. I have been a Grand Juror in co. Meath for fifty-two years, a chairman of the Kells Union for many years, and a magistrate for Meath and Cavan for about forty-five. In all my experience of the Royal County of Meath Grand Jury, I have ever found the greatest honesty, and we have ever acted on the terms of our oath without "fear, favour, or affection." If I ever saw on the Grand Jury the smallest inclination to jobbery, it was always put down immediately by almost unanimous clamour. The business is needful to the peaceful state of the people. The rents are most accurately paid, and I thank God the Demon of Agitation is without us. The County

Cess is the lowest in Ireland, and there cannot be a more peaceful county. No sensible person in Ireland wants any change in Governments. The Grand Jury system has always held the entire confidence of the Cess payer. The two great and very great evils for the last twenty years have been that Gladstone and Parnell. We always got on splendidly until these two dummies cropped up. —Yours faithfully,

John Arthur Farrell, of Maynalty, co. Meath.

So many Conservative Members have put down notices of opposition to Mr. Long's Dog Bill that it seems hardly likely that it will be persevered in. Mr. Long has hydrophobia on the brain, but, being himself a sportsman, he has evolved the singular idea that sporting dogs are not subject to the disease. If hydrophobia can—as is stated—only be propagated by one dog suffering from the disease biting another, then he might have insisted upon every dog in the United Kingdom being muzzled for a month, and no dog during the month being allowed to land without remaining in quarantine for a month. Whether the cases are so numerous as to justify this remedy is open to question. But this is certain, neither the present law nor the law as altered by Mr. Long's Bill can really stamp out the disease. They merely serve the purpose of annoying those who have dogs but do not keep them to run after foxes or deer, or to engage in any other form of sport.

Where there is nothing, says a French proverb, the King loses his rights, and I should say that the sovereign of Rhodesia, whether the Chartered Company, Mr. Rhodes, Mr. Chamberlain, or the British nation, will be in the position described by the proverb. As was shown in Truth in a return from the books of the Company, the foremost "patriots" in the undertaking have very wisely parted with nearly all their shares, whether those that they had paid for, or those which they allotted to themselves gratis; and this shows their estimate of the future prospects of the country. There is now to be a new issue of shares at 100 per cent. premium. If any fool likes to invest his money in this pricked bubble, by all means let him. The connection between a fool and his money is always a slight one, and, whether he parts with it in one way or another, is a matter of very little importance to the general community.

The latest Report of the Chartered Company deals with figures in a remarkable manner. The chief revenue of the Company seems to come from the sale of town lots—i.e., out of capital. Why any one should give a large sum for a town lot in Bulawayo, is like a purchase of the Company's shares—his affair, not mine. In America town lots in a new mining town are always run up to a high price. If the mines in the neighbourhood are shut down, the town lots are worthless. The balance of evidence is that there is not such an amount of paying gold in Rhodesia as will ever be likely, under the best of circumstances, to make gold-mining a serious industry, and therefore the town lots, which are dependent on its being a paying industry, are not, one would think, investments likely to be profitable.

There is one statement in the accounts which will need to be put right. The Company received certain land and mining rights on condition that it paid all costs of government. The Company now explains that, so soon as the Rhodesians enter into the right of self-government, all costs of wars, developments, &c., will be a charge on this self-governing community, the Company retaining its land and mining rights. As the community will not be able to pay interest on this outlay, the interest will have to be provided by the British taxpayer, if this pleasing theory be officially recognised. This "try-on" must, therefore, at once be resisted. The mining and land rights must remain chargeable with all expenses of government that cannot be met by fair taxation of the inhabitants of Rhodesia. Obviously the Company's statement is put forward to induce persons to buy its shares, the implication being that, come what may, a large portion of what it has sunk in follies will be recouped to it.

As yet no human being has profited by Rhodesia, except by what has been obtained from the long-suffering British investor. The Company staked all on finding gold, first in Mashonaland, next in Manicaland, next in Matabeleland; and when it was found that there was no paying gold in any of these countries, an attempt was made to raid the Transvaal. Heads we win, tails some one else loses, has been its doctrine, and, in accordance with this doctrine, the present plan of retaining all mining and land rights, and making some one else pay the rent in consideration of which it obtained these rights, has been elaborated.

The truth is that we are living at a moment in our history—let us hope a brief one—when a needy aristocracy and a pushing plutocracy have made common cause, and there is nothing which the allies may do in the pursuit of wealth that would not be condoned. When they make our distant dependencies the field of their monetary labours, and the Colonial Minister is a quondam Radical, who, as he boasts, has "joined the gentleman of England," I doubt if there is any crime that they might not commit with impunity; for he has to pay his footing as a condition of those whom he is pleased to call the "gentlemen of England" receiving him in their social bosom.

In one sense I am not particularly sorry that the moral sense of all those who do not boast that they are "the gentlemen of England" should have been outraged by Messrs. Rhodes, Beit, and Maguire being once again made directors of the Chartered Company of South Africa with the full approval of the Colonial Secretary, for the majority of the nation needs arousing to the despicable servitude to the aristocracy of money under which we have fallen. A few object lessons of this kind are useful. Speaking once about the position that had been created by the secession of Liberals to the Party of the "gentlemen of England," in consequence of his proposal to grant Home Rule to Ireland, Mr. Gladstone said to me, "You, and your friends the Radicals, will be the gainers in the end;" and then he explained the reaction which was likely to follow. Of this reaction, I do not entertain the slightest doubt, and everything that conduces to its speedy advent, is like the wind that clears the atmosphere.

I agree with a correspondent of the Standard. I have no doubt that the British troops behaved well at the recent encounter with the Dervishes in the Soudan; but I am by no means disposed to laud their achievements as though they had outdone the valour of Leonidas and his Spartans at Thermopylæ. The Dervishes were ordered by the Khalifa to advance under Mahm against the invading Anglo-Egyptian forces. They did so, and established themselves in a camp, to defend which they had dug rifle pits. Our forces fired projectiles of all sorts into the camp, at a distance that rendered it impossible for the Dervishes to return the fire. Then the camp was stormed and carried, the forces on both sides being about equal, but our troops being infinitely better armed. On our side less than one hundred were killed, on the Dervish side above two thousand. The business was creditably done by our troops and by the Egyptian troops. But the conclusion was foregone. The advance was well planned, and there was no flinching in the assault. But when the arms are entirely unequal, and the numbers engaged are the same on both sides, the better armed must win.

Nothing exemplifies the mixture of swagger and cringing that distinguishes our Jingoes more than the mode in which they have exulted over the congratulatory telegram of the German Emperor to the Queen. I confess that I never saw anything to complain of in the Emperor's former telegram to President Kruger. In the Transvaal there were many Germans engaged in business. A band of marauders, after secretly providing money to get up a revolution in Johannesburg, organised a raid from Rhodesia to aid and abet the revolution. The whole thing was a sordid stock-jobbing piece of iniquity. The Emperor sent a telegram to President Kruger congratulating him on the failure of the raid. Why should he not have done so? But our newspapers raged as though he had committed some monstrous crime. Now the Emperor sends the Queen a congratulatory telegram on a British victory over the Soudanese. At once we are told that he has amended his ways, and that he is anxious to ally himself with us. When the German newspapers explain that he is not desirous to alter his policy, or to become more closely allied with us than heretofore, our papers indignantly complain that the Germans are not willing to accept the olive branch that we extend to them. Our Jingo organs certainly succeed in never losing an occasion to render us ridiculous in the sight of the world.

Germany's policy is what it was in the days of Prince Bismarck, except that instead of wishing to depend entirely on a Russian alliance, she seeks to be also on good terms with France. To us she is neither a friend nor a foe, but, desiring to extend her commerce beyond Europe, she is by no means sorry that there should be some sort of maritime balance of power.

I have always contended that Russia is not at present, and is not likely to be in the near future, a serious commercial rival of this country, and that, consequently, we have little to fear from the extension of her rule over countries previously uncivilised. The soundness of this view is conspicuously shown by the letter from Mr. W. S. Caine, published the other day, dealing with the trade of the port of Batoum. Dismal were the forebodings which our Jingoes expressed when the Treaty of Berlin handed over Batoum to Russia. What has been the result? In 1881 fourteen British ships, with a tonnage of 16,000 tons entered and cleared from this port. In 1893 the number had risen to 529 ships, with a tonnage of 806,000, and, although these figures are the maximum, so far as tonnage is concerned, that has yet been reached, during the last five years the average British tonnage has been close on 700,000. This is about double the tonnage of Russian shipping at the same port, and not far short of that of all the rest of the world combined. In face of these figures, what senseless folly it is for us to shriek against the transfer of Asiatic sea-ports into Russian hands!

That pernicious insect, the Jingo microbe, which has caused such havoc with the intelligence of so many persons in this island, seems to have crossed the Atlantic and to be rioting in American brains. Cuba has been persistently misgoverned by Spain for centuries; it has been the happy hunting-ground of Spanish officials, military and civil. Periodically there has been an attempt at revolution. The latest has now lasted a considerable time, and the civil war has been carried on with that abundant cruelty that appears to be peculiar to the Spanish race. That the United States should interfere in order to put an end to a war, in which neither side seemed likely to get the upper hand, was right and reasonable. But when Spain offered such autonomy to the Cubans as would have made their relations to the mother country similar to those between us and the Dominion, everything was conceded that was necessary for humanity and good government.

In the United States, however, the microbe had been at work with the usual baneful result. The President is a man of sound sense, but he has allowed himself to be overborne by the clamour of those infected with the microbe. Suddenly Congress passes resolutions of such a nature that it is almost impossible for Spain to accept them with honour. Autonomy, it is said, is not enough; there must be independence. If a colony wishes to cut the tie that binds her to the mother country, she has a right to do so if she has the power. The efforts of the United States to secure good government for Cuba were to be commended. To engage in war in order to substitute independence for autonomy is hardly a proof of wisdom. If, however, the United States had deemed this necessary, the resolutions of Congress should have been carefully worded, in order to enable Spain to accept them, instead of being couched in defiant and bullying language.

Europe is divided into Great Powers, each one of which is wasting its substance on huge armaments. So huge are they, and so terrible would be the shock of war, that there seems to be an agreement amongst the inhabitants of these Powers that their respective Statesmen may bluster and swagger as they please, but on the understanding that all this is not to mean war. If the bluster of one does not cause the other against which it is directed to run away, then the blusterer, according to the rules of the game, is expected to execute a strategical movement to the rear. One of these days some Statesman will break through the rules of the game, and there will be some terrible war. But the United States, up to now, have not joined in this silly game of brag, and therefore their citizens are all the more to blame in substituting unreasoning impulse for plain practical common-sense.

A LAST APPEAL.

Is it too late for this appeal? Too late to plead for peace?
Too late to pray that clamorous tongues their shrieks for war may cease?
Is it too late in Reason's name one protest more to make,
And bid two angry nations pause for very pity's sake?

Death's angel poises for his flight as War's loud tocsin rings,
Already one can well-nigh hear the beating of his wings.
Already Hope is nearly dead, but even now there's time
To save two Christian people from a blunder and a crime.

'Tis not too late to plead with Spain; 'tis not as yet too late To bid her recollect great faults need reparation great;
'Tis not too late, the Fates be thanked! her people to implore
To freely make concessions now they should have made before.

They plume themselves upon their past; whatever may betide,
They wrap themselves unyieldingly in their unyielding pride;
Their honour is at stake, they say; and they perforce must fight—
But higher honour would be theirs, dared they but do what's right.

Then with America we'd plead; we'd ask her to restrain
Those evil passions, which, unchecked, take Pity's name in vain;
We'd credit her with motives good, but beg her to beware
Of those who in their party traps would Mercy's self ensnare.

"Go on! and right the wrongs," we'd say, by which you have been stirred,
To stay you from your noble task we would not say one word;
But have a care how you proceed, lest evils you abhor
Are magnified and multiplied a thousandfold by war.

"There may be many things in which you cannot acquiesce,
There may be grievances to end; injustice to redress;
But oh! it is a sorry work, full much to be deplored,
When the Philanthropist goes forth to solace with a sword!

"Barbarities there may have been, but nought, pray bear in mind,
Can be more barbarous than the war to which you seem inclined.
There may, there must be ways the pain of Cuba to appease,
But war's a desperate remedy far worse than the disease.

"Come, then, is there no other plan by which to work your will?
Has statesmanship its talent lost, diplomacy its skill?
Civilisation—is that, too, of all resource bereft?
Is war the one available and mad expedient left?"

No, this we can't and won't believe; we never will agree
Americans need Spaniards shoot that Cubans may be free!
Logic denies it, sense protests, humanity demurs;
Reason cries "No!" and in that cry all Christendom concurs.

Is it too late, then, we repeat, to make this last appeal?
Is it too late to put in words what all on-lookers feel?
Too late to hope that statesmanship with common-sense allied
May solve a problem that too long solution has defied?

SCRUTATOR.

A LESSON FROM RUSSIA.

WE and Russia have both sought to expand our respective Empires. But with Russia expansion and consolidation have gone together. Her aims have been limited to the acquisition of territories necessary for her well-being, and within striking distance of her land forces, and to securing the outlets to the open sea to which she is fairly entitled.

In Europe, she sought to secure an outlet to the Mediterranean. In face of treaties and of wars she is now certain to obtain it—indeed, to all intents and purposes, she has attained it. What remains of the Treaty that followed the Crimean War? Nothing; not a shred. England, France, Italy, and Turkey were pitted against her. They took Sebastopol, and our share in the cost of the war was about forty millions, interest on which we are still paying. At present France is her ally. Turkey has been brought within the sphere of her influence, and no reasonable human being can doubt that, in the event of a war with us, she will be mistress of the Dardanelles. In Asia, first she conquered Circassia and thus obtained the eastern shore of the Black Sea. Then she slowly and gradually absorbed the independent Khanates of Central Asia. At present, Siberia, which was not very many years ago a long slip of land, frost-bound and almost barbarous, has been civilised, and by extensions towards the south, has become almost as valuable to her as her European territories. Persia remains independent, but this independence is subject to Russia's good-will, for she can overrun the country with her armies whenever she pleases. Her latest efforts have been directed to Manchuria. She has secured the ports that she coveted on the Pacific, and Manchuria, with its countless millions of hardy inhabitants, will in a few years be Russian in reality, if not in name. How have we sought to hinder all this? By endeavouring to lay down the principle that Turkey, the Asiatic Khanates, and Manchuria, ought to remain barbarous and misgoverned in order to act as buffer States between us and Russia. In this struggle against civilisation we have been worsted, and rightly worsted. When a barbarous State is contiguous to a civilised State, the former must in the nature of things be sooner or later absorbed by the latter, provided that she be strong and powerful, and that no other civilised State is in a position to prevent the absorption. It is as foolish to expect anything else, as it would have been to suppose that the United States would not spread themselves over the Far West of the North American Continent, and convert the Red Indian hunting fields into the abodes of civilised men. Russia has been more wise than we in her method of Asiatic conquest. A semi-Asiatic State herself, what she has taken she has made Russian. There has been no hard and-fast line between conquerors and conquered. The two have been merged in one common whole.

Whilst Russia has had definite aims in view, and has adapted her aims to her limitations, we have been fooling away our strength in seeking to expand without consolidating. In these expansions we have endeavoured to bring within our rule subject races, rather than to convert these races into fellow subjects of one State. In Asia, we became possessed of India. We have extended our Asiatic Empire, but the Indians have remained our subjects, and our unwilling subjects. We have not absorbed India, but we have ruled over it by the power of the sword. In Africa, we have added huge districts to our Empire, peopled by races that are not likely to add to our strength or to our wealth. Egypt was a State, Oriental in its civilisation, but still civilised after the Eastern fashion. We have occupied it for nearly twenty years. Yet, although our rule has been better than the native rule, its people are bitterly hostile to us, and, had they the slightest chance of success, they would rise against us. Egypt is no more English to-day than it was before we went there. We have made it a jumping-off ground for further conquest. Why, in the name of all that is reasonable, should we, a sea, not a land, Power, want to have a line of possessions from Alexandria to Cape Town, running not along the coast, but through the interior of Africa? What use is this to us? Why, with millions on millions of half-civilised subjects, should we imagine that we are strengthened by having more? We know perfectly well that the sole possibility of any of the negro races in the interior of Africa being able to buy our goods is, that they be forced to labour in order to produce something that they can exchange for them. In theory we are opposed to forced labour. Then why, in practice, acquire territories—poor under any circumstances—in order to maintain in them forced labour? In Southern Africa we had vast possessions. In the Cape Colony the majority of the inhabitants are of Dutch origin, but they were ready to become Englishmen. Our aim seems to have been to keep up the line of demarcation between English and Dutch.

What has been the outcome of all this folly? Our expenditure on armaments has become greater than that of any one of those great military Continental Powers, whose expenditure on armies we, not many years ago, regarded as almost a proof of insanity. By proclaiming that we must have a navy able to convert the high seas into British ponds, and to make the sea roads into British highways, we have forced other nations into maritime expenditure, with the result that our relative naval strength and theirs is much what it was before. Why have we been so foolish? Because our Statesmen have followed the lead of our newspaper howlers, instead of doing their best to stem the current of the rampant Jingoism preached by these self-appointed guides of public opinion. The newspapers have been engaged in a competition of folly. They have sneered at the wise counsels that would have us regard war as the direst of evils, and rest satisfied with having the greatest empire the world ever knew. Of our statesmen, so far as our foreign relations have been concerned, Lord Salisbury has been one of the wisest. Left to himself, and without the more reckless of his followers hounding him on, he would have been the wisest. It is for this reason that, apart from all home issues, his action, where he has resisted these reckless followers, should find approval with Radicals.

It is all very well for the Jingoes to try to force the country to act on their views, by denouncing as traitors to the Empire all who venture to suggest that these views will conduce neither to our well-being nor to our strength. Abuse is not argument. The same doctrines proposed by those who to-day are termed "Little Englanders" are those that were entertained by every English Statesman of the present century, until within a few years ago; and these Statesmen were, to say the least, as intelligent as Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett.

ZOLA AND THE PAVING STONES.

When amateur legists of one country criticise the legal procedure of another, with a view to show that some particular trial has been conducted unfairly, their strictures miss the point, for, although the procedure may be open to amendment, yet justice requires that it should be followed by the Law Courts unless they are to invade the province of the Legislature. This is what has happened in respect to the Zola, Dreyfus, and Esterhazy imbroglio.

Dreyfus was tried by court-martial, and, having been found guilty of treason, was condemned to penal servitude for life. This trial was—as permitted by law—held in secret. The friends of Dreyfus asserted that Esterhazy was guilty of the act imputed to Dreyfus. He, too, was tried by court-martial. The proceedings were in part public and in part secret. The trial resulted in his acquittal. Then came the Zola trial. He made sweeping charges against all concerned in the two courts-martial, accused the Minister of War and other officers of high rank of having been engaged in a conspiracy to send an innocent man to penal servitude, and explicitly charged the Esterhazy court-martial with having knowingly acquitted a guilty man. Zola was found guilty, but, having appealed to the Cour de Cassation, the finding was upset on technical grounds in respect to procedure.

Zola is to be re-tried. In the first trial the Court held that he could not indirectly raise the question whether there had been errors of procedure in the Dreyfus trial. This decision seemed to me to be in accordance with common sense, for the trial had been in secret, and the secrecy could not well be invaded on a side issue. He, indeed, himself admitted this, for he explained that he was attempting to raise the issue of the innocence or guilt of Dreyfus in a "revolutionary" fashion. In the second trial, in order to prevent any such attempt being indirectly made, Zola is to be tried on one single statement in his general accusation against the military authorities. This is, "a court-martial has just, by order, ventured to acquit an Esterhazy—an unparalleled blow dealt at all truth and all justice."

Against such a limitation, Zola says that "the paving-stones will rise up." They may, though this is not probable. But I fail to understand how any one with more sense than a paving-stone can find fault with it. Esterhazy was tried on a definite issue, i.e., whether he had done what a court-martial found had been done by Dreyfus. To charge the court-martial with having given a verdict of not guilty "by order," is as strong an imputation as well can be levelled against a Court of Law. If Zola can prove it, well and good; if not, he ought to be punished, and would be punished under any system of jurisprudence existing in a civilised community. Mere assertion, mere rhetorical clap-trap, go for nothing in a Court of Law. If, however, we are to judge by what Zola and his friends have published, he has nothing but this to submit to the Court.

That Dreyfus was guilty I entertain no doubt, for I have never seen one iota of evidence that could upset the finding of the court-martial that tried him. That the procedure of the court-martial was technically faulty may be true, but as the trial was secret, neither I nor any one else can assert it to be true. With Zola himself I have not a vestige of sympathy. On his former trial, he adduced no evidence of the innocence of Dreyfus, but swore by his own novels that the man was innocent. Now he rails against all those who refuse to believe in the innocence to which he has sworn.

Zola wrote various novels—clever but so filthy that, when translated into English and published here, the publisher was sent to prison. Of late he has written three novels, which he calls a trilogy of three towns. The first is an account of Lourdes, in which he indulges in a surgical account of various horrible diseases. The second is an account of Rome, in which he asserts that the Cardinals are in the habit of poisoning each other, the rest of the book being a long-winded handbook of Rome. The third is an account of Paris. I have not read it, because I have heard from persons whose opinions I value, and who have themselves read it, that it is not worth reading. This trilogy has fallen flat. Zola believes that he is a prophet vouchsafed to the world by Providence, and he deems all justifiable which rivets attention on himself. He, therefore, has rushed forward as the defender of Dreyfus's innocence, and he accuses the leading military men of France of a conspiracy to send an innocent man to penal servitude because he considers that this sensational accusation will attract notice to himself, much as he dealt in filthy details in his novels in order to attract attention to those works.

As for Esterhazy, he seems to be a very disreputable person. I think it exceedingly likely that, in order to raise the wind, he has before now been a traitor. But, so far as I have been able to discover, there is no more evidence that he was guilty of the particular treason charged against Dreyfus than I was. If it can be shown that he and Dreyfus were both concerned in this particular act, this would hardly prove Dreyfus to be innocent. They may have been confederates. This, however, has not been proved, and, if it were, instead of Dreyfus being released, Esterhazy should be sent to join him on his island. In the present day, it is more difficult for a rich man to be kept in prison than for him to enter the Kingdom of Heaven. Immense sums have been spent to restore Dreyfus to his country and to his family. I do not think that the English Press has been corrupted, but it has not mastered the facts, and has been adroitly led astray by friends and allies of the traitor. We are told that his sufferings are great. The sufferings of most persons condemned to penal servitude are great. Treason such as his is the vilest and most despicable of crimes, and therefore his sufferings in no way appeal to my sympathies, so long as I see no reason to doubt the justice of his punishment.

THE INVENTIONS COMPETITION TRICK.

As promised in last week's TRUTH, I now give a few facts showing the scale on which the newspaper "Inventions Competition" dodge has been worked during the last twelve months, and the amount of grist it has brought to the mill of the enterprising firm who devised this magnificent invention for stimulating inventors and enlarging the patent trade.

For the sake of clearness, it may be convenient to remind the reader at the outset of the principal features of the scheme. To begin with, sundry newspapers—chiefly the weekly editions of provincial journals, which circulate largely among the working classes—publish a flowery prospectus of a competition, which they profess to have originated for the benefit partly of any of their readers who are of an inventive turn, and partly for the benefit of the nation at large, which is to benefit by the multiplication of new and useful inventions resulting from the competition. A first prize is offered of fifteen guineas in cash, a second of a complete patent "value twelve guineas," a third of a provisional protection "value four guineas," and these are to be supplemented by a wholesale distribution of medals and diplomas. No restriction is placed upon the nature of the article submitted for competition, but competitors are instructed that the most valuable inventions are as a rule simple improvements of articles in common use. The vanity of ignorant inventors is artfully stimulated by suggestions that technical knowledge is quite a subordinate qualification for the production of a valuable invention; and the hook is baited with the most extravagant representations of the vast sums to be made by patenting simple ideas. To enter on this competition for a fortune only one condition of any importance is laid down, namely, that each specification entered must be patented, or at least provisionally protected. This is represented as a condition imposed by the proprietors of the journal merely to safeguard the interests of the competitors. Why the proprietors should be so solicitous for the interests of the competitors as to decline to enter even the most worthless invention for competition unless a patent is taken out, they do not attempt to indicate. The competitors are expected to take their benevolence on trust. But, as a further proof of the disinterested motives of the promoters, it is announced that the newspaper has made arrangements under which competitors will be able to take out protection at the "reduced" price of three and a half guineas for provisional protection or eleven guineas for a full patent. On these terms the competition starts. The competitors—mostly, of course, people of humble position and limited means—come forward in their hundreds. The guineas for provisional protection or complete patents roll in by thousands; and in due course a cash prize of fifteen guineas is awarded, together with two others in the shape of provisional or complete protection, and a munificent shower of medals and paper "diplomas." The difference between the value of these prizes, medals, and diplomas, and the thousands of guineas paid by the competitors is the profit on the competition.

And who takes the profit? Presumably the newspapers which start the competition get a share of it. But the bulk goes to the enterprising firm of patent agents who are the real originators and managers of the undertaking—Messrs. Rayner & Co., of 37, Chancery-lane. Beyond receiving the first letters which the competitors send in—which are merely applications for particulars—the newspapers take no part in the competition after the first announcement until the award of prizes. In the capacity of "patent editors" of the various journals concerned, Rayner & Co. manage all the intermediate stages. They conduct, from 37, Chancery-lane, all correspondence with the competitors, they receive the fees and take out the patents, and there cannot be any doubt that it is they who not only award, but actually give, the prizes. From these facts, and from the fact that while several newspapers announce the competition simultaneously, one set of prizes serves for the whole lot, it is perfectly evident that the enterprise originates with Rayner & Co., and is in fact their speculation from beginning to end. The whole pretence that the competition is started by certain newspapers, and that the prizes are offered by them, for the benefit of their readers and on public grounds, is in fact a gross misrepresentation—designed to conceal the fact that the thing is a speculation of a firm of patent agents for their own profit.

A more general statement can give but a faint idea either of the delusive and mischievous character of this scheme, or the scale on which it has been carried out. Let us look now at a few facts which throw further light on these points. The first competition of which I have particulars was commenced in the Western Mail (Cardiff) and the News of the World, a London weekly, last summer. It was ostensibly organised in celebration of the Diamond Jubilee. Whether more than these journals took part in this demonstration of loyalty, I do not know. In the particulars issued from the "Western Mail Patent Department, 37, Chancery-lane, London, W.C. (Bankers: Bank of England)" it was entitled "The Record Reign Inventions Competition," the circular containing the following interesting announcement:—

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

INVENTION OF THE RECORD REIGN.

Competitors will remember that this invention is meant to mark the era of the Record Reign of her Gracious Majesty the Queen, and if possible the successful inventions will be placed before her Majesty for approval. This notice will, we think, stir up the inventive capacity of our readers, and bring forward a really successful window-fastener which shall last for all time.

This competition, unlike those which have succeeded it, was limited entirely to improvements in one article, the window-fastener here alluded to. Prizes to the value of thirty-one guineas were offered, together with fifty medals and fifty "diplomas of honour." According to a statement published later on in the Western Mail, "several hundred" competitors came forward under the influence of these various inducements. If that is true, the requirement that all competitors should take out protection was not insisted upon, for the records of the Patent Office show that only 197 applications for protection on the subject of fastening windows, doors, &c., were filed during the period the competition was open. But it is, at any rate, certain that 148 awards were issued at the close of the competition. Whether there were "several hundred" or only 148, the whole galaxy of mechanical geniuses do not seem to have produced among them "a really successful window-fastener which shall last for all time;" neither have I heard that a single one out of their inventions was deemed worthy of being "placed before her Majesty for her approval." The net result, in fact, of this loyal and patriotic attempt to celebrate the Diamond Jubilee was that about 140 or more deluded simpletons paid sums ranging from three and a half guineas upwards to Messrs. Rayner & Co. for no result whatever, beyond the award of a few pounds' worth of prizes, and a profuse distribution of medals and diplomas. It is a fact deserving of note that, in addition to the rewards offered at the outset, forty-five extra diplomas of honour were awarded at the conclusion of this competition, bringing up the total number of awards to 148. In view of what follows it will be for the reader to judge for himself whether these awards were given for any other purpose than that of inducing the competitors to patent their window-fasteners, under the belief that they had produced articles of great merit and commercial value.

Inspired apparently by the success of this preliminary effort, Messrs. Rayner & Co. next proceeded to organise, towards the end of the year, the competition in the Leeds Mercury (Weekly Supplement) and other papers, which has already been fully described in TRUTH. This time no restriction was placed on the character of the article entered for competition, and the newspapers promoting this inventors' caucus-race seriously undertook to compare the merits of inventions having absolutely nothing in common —it might be to adjudicate between the claims of a new tobacco-pipe and a new electric lamp, or between an improved frying-pan and a novelty in motor-cars. For the guidance of competitors, however, various articles were specified as likely to repay the application of a little inventive genius, e.g., ladies' hair or hat pins, cycle tyres, and cowls for smoky chimneys; and in the list appears, strange to say, our old friend the window-sash fastener, which had already, in the Western Mail competition, produced 148 highly meritorious new inventions, embodying, in the language of the "patent editors," "one of the best exhibitions of ingenuity that has possibly been gathered together upon one definite subject." "An improved window fastener," said the Leeds Mercury prospectus, "will probably pay the inventor well, as the present ones now in use have many failings." I invite Mr. George Rayner, when he next finds himself moved to communicate with TRUTH, to justify, if he can, this invitation to the unwary to pay him more fees for improved sash fasteners, in view of the fact that he had, within a few months previously, taken fees from over 140 inventors of similar articles, every one of whose inventions he had pronounced worthy of a prize, a medal, or a "diploma of honour." As the thing stands at present, I am of opinion that a more unscrupulous attempt to humbug ignorant people into parting with their money has rarely been perpetrated. Mr. Rayner, it will be remembered, has already, in the letter published last week, declared that it was no part of the business of the judges in the competition to go into the question of novelty or infringement of existing patents, so that he was actually publishing this wholesale invitation to people to invent and patent (through him) fresh window fasteners with the knowledge that upwards of 140 such articles had been patented (provisionally) or otherwise during the previous nine months, and with no intention of warning the fresh competitors before he took their money, in case it happened, as in some cases it could hardly fail to do, that they were merely covering the same ground over again.

Simultaneously with the Leeds Mercury this record competition was carried on in the Newcastle Weekly Chronicle, the Portsmouth Times, the Lynn Advertiser, the Devon and Exeter Gazette, the Northern Echo, the Poole Guardian, the Eastbourne Gazette, and the Skibbereen Eagle, and, for aught I know, in other provincial papers. An action was brought in the local county-court, as already mentioned, by a dissatisfied competitor to recover the fees which he had paid through the Leeds Mercury. The action was defeated by its removal into the High Court at the instance of the defendants. On the application for that purpose, Mr. Rayner, in his capacity of "patent editor," made an affidavit, in which he swears that if the plaintiff succeeded, the proprietors of the Leeds Mercury would be liable to have "upwards of 200 actions brought against them by such competitors." Such, then, was the number of inventors who paid fees in this competition through the Leeds Mercury alone. The reader may guess for himself what the number amounted to among the whole of the nine or more papers which took a hand in the game.

Mr. Rayner is now again on the warpath in all directions. Among the papers which have recently published his announcements are Great Thoughts, the Hull News Supplement, the Builders' Reporter, the Doncaster Chronicle, the Southampton Times and Hampshire Express, the Stockton News, the Burton Chronicle, the Walsall Free Press, the Oldham Chronicle, and the Burnley Express. With regard to the first two (Great Thoughts and the Hull News), it should be stated that shortly after the appearance of the TRUTH article of March 10 the competitions were withdrawn from those papers—a fact for which the editors and proprietors are entitled to all credit. It is also worthy of note that the advertisements published during the last two or three weeks contain a notification that the paper is putting forward the competition "in conjunction with other important newspapers in various parts of the kingdom," and there is also a further express intimation that competitors may obtain protection for their inventions in any manner best suited to their convenience. From this there is reason to hope that the criticism of TRUTH has not been without its effect, both upon the newspapers which are acting with Mr. Rayner and also upon that gentleman himself.

Now let us look at the amount of cash which must have passed in connection with the Rayner competitions, so far as they have yet gone. Setting aside the published statement that "several hundred" competitors entered for the Weekly Mail competition, it is certain that the number was not less than 145. In the Leeds Mercury competition, on Mr. Rayner's sworn statement, upwards of 200 competitors have entered, making about 350 from these two papers alone. Seeing that my own researches alone disclose no less than twenty-one papers in which the competitions have been advertised, one is probably within the mark in reckoning that Rayner & Co. must have secured from eginning to end at least a thousand applications. One housand applications at £3 10s.—the amount of the educed fees at which Rayner & Co. undertook the usiness—would mean a total payment of £3,500 for rovisional protection only—£1,000 to the Patent Office, nd £2,500 to Rayner & Co. A gentleman who has nterested himself in the subject, has been good enough o work out for me some further calculations as to the robable subsequent payments, based upon the figures in he last published report of the Comptroller-General. Taking the average of one thousand applications as hown in that report, it appears that 509 out of every housand will probably abandon their applications and sacrifice their fees (total £1,781 10s.), while 491 will seal their provisional protections. For this they will pay to the "patent editors" a further sum of £7 10s. (making up the total of £11), out of which £3 goes to the Government as stamp duty, leaving £4 10s. (or a total of £2,209 10s.) to the agents. On this calculation the total amount paid to the agents for provisional protection and full patent on one thousand applications would be upwards of £4,700. Should the patentees keep their patents alive by renewal fees after the first four years, the agent will receive a further fee of half a guinea on each annual renewal. Taking the averages calculated as above from the last report of the Comptroller-General, one thousand applications for protection should be worth to an agent, from beginning to end, upwards of £5,000, the greater part of that amount being paid in the first year. In addition to this there are the fees for protection abroad. That Messrs. Rayner & Co. do not overlook any chance of doing business in this direction may be seen from the case already mentioned in TRUTH, where, having awarded a "diploma of merit" to a window-sash fastener purchased at a shop, and patented long ago, they proceeded to press upon the competitor the importance of his at once taking out protection in the United States, Germany, France, and Belgium. Even without fees under this head, however, enough has been said to show what these competitions are worth to Messrs. Rayner & Co., and what they are likely in the aggregate to cost the readers of the various papers which have taken part in them. They will also show that in offering on three occasions prizes to the value of £31 (half of that amount simply in the shape of a waiver of their own fees for taking out protection), Messrs. Rayner & Co. have not thrown a very big sprat for the purpose of landing their whale.

I trust that what has now been said on the subject in this and previous articles will be sufficient to show, beyond all possibility of question, the magnitude of the raid that has been carried out under the guise of these "inventions competitions" upon a peculiarly simple and gullible portion of the public, as well as the deception and trickery which have characterised the whole business. When I first mastered the scheme in all its details and ramifications, it occurred to me that the one real inventor who had been brought to light by the whole series of competitions was Mr. George Rayner himself; and I almost wondered that he had not himself taken out protection for his own truly marvellous improvements in the modus operandi of a patent agent. But it turns out that the invention is not new, and, whatever doctrine he may hold in regard to his clients, Mr. Rayner is far too shrewd a man of business to waste his own money in patenting an idea which has been anticipated. The "inventions competition," like so many other novel and ingenious ideas, comes from the United States. I do not know enough to say that the idea has been worked out there in precisely similar shape, but the principle is the same. The result of one inventions competition in the United States was that the agent and his firm who promoted it were, by order of the Commissioner of the United States Patent Office, disqualified from further practice on the ground of gross misconduct; and some of the observations of the Commissioner upon that case are distinctly relevant to the present one:—

> Sometimes devices, seemingly simple and inconsequential, have proved very valuable to the inventor or owner of the patent; but these instances are like angels' visits, very few and far between.
> They serve, however, when placed before plain, honest people, in connection with certain suggestive hints and misrepresentations to the effect that there is a great unoccupied territory which inventors may immediately enter with profit and honour, and that the arts pertaining to the common affairs of life and the utensils of every-day use may be readily improved upon, and the improvements patented with pecuniary profit and advantage to the inventor, to mislead and deceive; and thus by well-contrived, false, and delusive suggestions and misleading statements, thousands of men and women in various parts of the country have been induced by the respondents to part with their money in the belief that an opportunity to make a fortune awaited them if they could invent some improvement on an attachment for a rocking-chair, a chalk-sharpener, washing-machine, buckle, butter and cheese-cutter, or any one of the thousand things used on the farm, in the shop, factory, or home. . . .
> To endeavour to impress upon the public the idea that any one without experience in the art, without knowledge of what is claimed in the art, without study and thought and experiment, can evolve inventions of value, is as demoralising as the idea so strenuously insisted upon by lottery agents that any one who buys a ticket may win the great prize. . . . . To encourage would-be patentees to believe there is a great demand for the most simple inventions, when, in fact, there is no such demand, to endeavour to impress upon the public a false and exaggerated idea of the value of simple inventions, to induce ignorant persons to believe that old and well-tried fields of invention are new and untried fields in which inventions of value can be readily made by them, all for the purpose of inducing the payment of fees for searches and for other purposes, is demoralising and deceptive and amounts to gross misconduct.
> A prize competition open only to those who have paid money to the respondents clearly has nothing philanthropic or generous about it, is not intended for broadly stimulating invention, but is intended solely to boom respondents' business. It is necessary to a fair competition that the jury or board of awards should be impartial, disinterested men, competent to decide on the merits, and it is also necessary that such jury or board should see and examine the invention submitted. To permit the merit of inventions to be finally passed upon by inexperienced and incompetent searchers is to make the competition a mere farce and a fraud.

The last sentence has no application to the present case, for the simple reason that Messrs. Rayner & Co., as they avow, made no attempt to investigate the novelty of the inventions submitted. The difference in the patent-law of the two countries doubtless explains why an American competition-monger would feel it necessary to, at least, go through the form of pronouncing on the novelty of the competition to which prizes or other awards were adjudged. But this difference in the law only gives additional force, in the case of England, to the general condemnation pronounced upon such competitions by the American Patent Commissioner; and for the rest, the reader can see for himself how exactly some of the methods adopted in the various newspaper competitions that have been described above coincide with those on which the United States Commissioner pronounces his scathing censure. We have in England, I understand, a "Chartered Institute of Patent Agents." What jurisdiction it possesses over the members of the profession I do not know. But unless it is in a position to put a stop to such gross abuses as those which have now been brought to light, its authority can be worth very little.

As for the newspapers that have been assisting in this raid upon the humblest and most ignorant of their readers, I confess I am lost in amazement at their conduct. They have not merely advertised the patent agent's seductive scheme, but they have identified themselves with it as principals, and in so doing they have added incalculably to its power for mischief. For a patent agent to offer in his own name prizes and diplomas to all the inventors who will take out protection at reduced fees through his office would be a trick almost too thin to put into practice; but the thing stands on a totally different footing when a paper like the Cardiff Mail, the Leeds Mercury, or the Newcastle Chronicle offers such a scheme as its own plan for the benefit of its readers. For a patent agent, advertising for business, to hold out dazzling suggestions of the vast sums waiting to be realised by the simplest inventions, to talk about the rubber tip on a lead pencil having yielded £20,000, and a patent shoe-string £500,000, is, after all, no worse than the sort of "gas" to which the patent medicine men and others resort in puffing their own wares, and the reader can discount it accordingly. But it is a different matter altogether when such flim-flams are put forward as the editorial utterances of widely circulated and influential newspapers, and when the editors or proprietors of these journals themselves ask their readers to pay over sums of three and a half or eleven guineas in the hope of realising equally splendid profits. It is this co-operation of the Press which has enabled Messrs. Rayner & Co. to rope in poor and uneducated men by the hundred, and to exact from each his toll of hard-earned guineas; and the responsibility of the papers for the result must be measured accordingly. They may think themselves lucky that the victims are for the most part poor and uneducated, for I believe that every one of them could be compelled to refund the money if the matter were brought to an issue in a law court; and when Mr. Rayner swore that the proprietors of the Leeds Mercury would be liable to upwards of two hundred actions if a single plaintiff obtained judgment against them, he probably did not state one tenth of the total liability arising out of his competitions. If only as a matter of business, I advise those who are still connecting themselves with this shady business to be wise in time. That the majority have erred through pure carelessness, and without realising in the least the true bearings of the operation with which they were identifying themselves, I readily believe. But, put it at the best, the whole business is as disgraceful to the Press as it is mischievous to the public, and it ought to be stopped at once.

ALEXANDER THE IMPOSSIBLE.

From the playbill at the St. James's it appears that Mr. George Alexander is the proud employer of a stage manager, a busi. ... manager, and a secretary. I believe these gentlemen to be courteous and capable A.D.C.s. But I should like to know what Mr. Alexander has done to Mr. Shone, Mr. Vincent, and Mr. R. G. Legge that they have retaliated so malignantly as to connive at his production of "The Conquerors," a drama in four acts, by Paul Potter. There may be doubts about many pieces which are condemned on a first hearing, but there are unhappily no doubts whatever about "The Conquerors," nor damns enough for its deserts in all the hard swearing of the Commination Service. It is not witty, it is badly constructed, and as to its taste I can only confirm the opinion of the man in the stalls last Thursday, who cried out "This is disgraceful," and left the theatre at the end of the first act. Do not jump to the conclusion that the piece is, therefore, immorally attractive. I hope, and indeed believe, that no such arrière pensée inhabits the gentle bosom of Mr. Alexander, and if you go to the St. James's in that expectation you will be disappointed. "The Conquerors" is unpleasant, but not alluring; rather is it crude, banal, and absurd—with the banalities of a badly brought up schoolboy and the violence of the least mitigated melodrama—and, finally, it is a libel on the manners of a foreign army. The action takes place the day after Sedan, in a castle at Dinan. The Germans, of course, are "the Conquerors," and their General and his staff are quartered in a great country-house. In the first act, Eric von Rodeck and friends are seen carousing. They shoot at the family portraits, break the best family china, and bring in French "dancing girls"—a very hardy euphemism—to sup with them. Enters to them the daughter of the house, Yvonne de Grandpré. She has "words" with Master von Rodeck, and not unjustly anoints his fair head with a glass of wine. "You women of France are ours. You shall be mine!" he cries, and he is trying to get at her across the table when the curtain drops. It was perhaps fortunate that the gentleman in the stalls who resented Act I. did not wait for its successor. We are introduced to the village cabaret, and learn that in that terrible September of '70, the French villagers spent their time in perpetual carnival, directed by Mr. Legge, as chief "Orpheonist." Yvonne comes to the cabaret, and so do the Uhlans. Alexander von Rodeck finds her there, and presently he and his brother officers are casting lots for the privilege of dishonouring her. To be fair, I should add that two of them are unconscious of their victim's identity; but when that is disclosed, and Von Rodeck wins the game, they leave her to her fate without lifting a boot to incapacitate her Alexander. When it comes to the point, Yvonne screams and apparently goes mad. She is, in fact, merely hysterical, and the hysterics are the only weak point in what is otherwise, in Miss Julia Neilson's hands, a charming night's work. But, mad or hysterical, she is too much for Von Rodeck, who abandons his design, and conceives a pure passion for her from that hour. The rest of the piece, with its vapourings, mock heroics, and quick changes of affection, is simply "dam silly." That was the opinion of a second unauthorised critic, a gentleman in the gallery, whose comment I overheard later in King-street. "Wot can you expect," asked his companion, "from the man that put on 'Is Little Dodge' at the Royalty?" I confess—with no great pride—that I liked "His Little odge," but the conversation may suggest to Mr. lexander the propriety of taking in sail. Frankly, I emur to "The Conquerors." It is prettily put on, and Miss Neilson, Mr. Fred Terry, and Mr. H. B. Irving waste alent as freely as the manager has spent scenery on hat was not worth so much taste and care. But I islike the show of French and German manners as hey appear to Mr. Paul M. Potter. I deplore the weakness of such "Conquerors," and the violence of the author's effects, and I object to the very concessions to decency which somehow make the result not less but more offensive than if the worst reports of this advertised piece had been realised. Nothing can be more unpleasant than the darkening of the stage and other preparations for Von Rodeck's chivalrous revenge. For the rest, where much was absurd and disagreeable it is unnecessary to particularise, but under the first category I think that the automatic choir, which the Chateau Grandpré turned on at intervals, is sufficiently foolish, while the part of Foulette, as played by Miss Victor, adorned the second. The manager who thought these elderly frivolities becoming has an odd sense of what is due to his public and his art. The language was mildly amusing. Von Rodeck talks of "facing the music" and "folding his tents like the Arabs," but these are small matters. It is not a small matter that the Licenser should have permitted the piece to be produced. Mr. Redford has done two things. He has demonstrated the need of a Censor in a country where managers care to produce such plays, and he has proved beyond any question the unfitness of a Censor who passes such a piece.

MORE STARS AND STRIPES.

Whatever my colleague Moses Moss may say of Yankee Rails, the boom in stage Americans continues. There were no uneasy palpitations about "The Heart of Maryland" when I diagnosed it last week, and now "The Belle of New York," and "Too Much Johnson" are eminently "firm." The "Belle" is a bouncing young person—noisier, more dazzling, and more restless than her English sister, not very fine, perhaps, but conspicuously large. The story is like our own Gaiety pieces—that is, a labyrinth. But new types wander through it—a Bowery "tough" and his "donah," as we should call her, two Portuguese Counts, Chinamen of course: all things, in short, pretty much as your prophetic soul may have conceived proper to New York comic opera. There are some individual surprises. Mr. Dan Daly, the chief comedian, is one. Miss Edna May, again, the Salvation lassie, is the most demure little rogue imaginable, with a delightful voice and a real turn for comedy. She has only to make up her mind, to become an actress, seriously delightful. As it is, she made the Salvation Army dress becoming, and I wish she would wear it through the evening. It is in their chorus where the invaders principally beat us. That is ample, and its members are sufficiently handsome; but the point is that they all sing and act as though the evening was theirs to make or mar. You could not mistake a single one of them for a piece of scenery, whereas in our own choruses——!

Not often outside comic opera have I seen a coherent piece which was quite so irresponsible as "Too Much Johnson." It is a merry nightmare—the sort of dream which might beset your pillow after a night's talk with Mr. Gillette, following weeks of tiresome people dinning in your ears the name of Cuba. The play-bill does not pretend that the piece is anything else. It does not describe itself as farce, comedy, tragedy, or burlesque; it is simply "Mr. William Gillette in his most recent attempt to kill time, which answers to the name of 'Too Much Johnson,' supported by Charles Frohman's company of comedians." That is all it is! Mr. Gillette, looking and talking exactly as he always does, and in the very accents with which he afterwards addressed a delighted house, pretends to be Mr. Augustus Billings; but one knows he is not. It is simply Mr. Gillette. Augustus Gillette, however, has married a wife, and the wife has a mother, and Augustus has been flirting and a consistent truant from home. He explains his absence to mamma-in-law on the score of Cuba; he has coffee estates, and—well, a man obviously must visit his coffee estates. Alas! coffee was a synonym for Clairette, a lady with a jealous husband. Providence now descended heavily on Augustus. His wife and his mother insisted on his taking them on one of his voyages to Cuba. Conceive Augustus en route for Cuba. He has a planter friend there who will see him through and pretend anything. But every man gets the mother-in-law he deserves, and Augustus's relative, rummaging in his pockets, finds love-letters addressed to one Johnson. Augustus is cornered. He has a happy thought—Johnson is the friend of Clairette and his overseer. Augustus breathes again. But M. Dathis appears. He is Clairette's husband, and he is searching the world for Johnson, with half a photograph with which to identify that destroyer of his hearth and home. Augustus squares M. Dathis—never mind how—he squares him. And then comes Mr. Francis Faddish, with his niece and her youthful adorer. They are all going out to Cuba—and to Johnson. For there is a real Johnson, and such a Johnson! He has bought Augustus's friend's, the planter's, property, and lives there Christianising the black man with all the charms of character and presence which distinguish the worst sort of pirate and the entire race of pantomime ogres. So Uncle Faddish, with Johnson's fiancée, whom Johnson has never seen, Augustus, who believes his friend the collusive planter is in Johnson's shoes and that Johnson is a myth, and Mrs. Augustus and her mother, who look upon Johnson as the incarnation of all the vices, are all sprung upon Johnson. Conceive, if you can, the delight of the party, and the delight of Johnson! But you cannot conceive these things unless you go the Garrick and "sit under" your Gillette. He is as ingenious in his way as the author of "Alice in Wonderland," and his voice, his look, his incomparable dry humour are an inspired accompaniment to his invention. All the company act well, if acting is the word for it. I came away in the belief that it is a very mad world, but a funny one, that one cannot have "too much" Frohman, that Mr. Gillette is great, and that I should be proud to be his prophet.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE GIRL-QUEEN OF HOLLAND.

PARIS is in love with the Queen of the Netherlands; and no wonder. She personifies life's delightful morn as it never was before upon a throne. Wilhelmina seems rich in that joy of life which constantly eluded her two brothers. She promises to carry her sceptre as she might bear a rose. Her carriage is singularly free, and gives the impression of growth still going on. She is very well formed, has well-shaped features, a complexion that would beautify any face, fine blue eyes, and golden hair that forms a nimbus round her head. One can see that she is sensitive and impressionable. But the placid conditions of life in the Netherlands have not weighed on her. Great care was taken to develop bodily strength. She skates as only a Dutch girl can, is an accomplished equestrian, plays lawn tennis, and is up to all the athletic accomplishments of a girl of the period, save cycling. The line was drawn at the bike, which was thought undignified and dangerous. One can hardly suppose she would take it up after her swearing-in as Sovereign. This ceremony will come off in September, and the most worthy Regent will step from before the young Queen to her side.

Wilhelmina, in spite of her light green silk dress—so provincial in its general air—looked captivating as she stepped the other morning from the railway train that brought her to Paris. That event took place at eight o'clock. She was rosy as the dawn, and with no rude flush. Her gladsome countenance contrasted with the placid faces behind her and before her on the platform. She stepped down with a springy step. Nothing could be more girlish and less miss-ish than her bearing, and still it seemed made up of easy dignity. The absence of pose was very charming. Any other girl of eighteen must have been at a fearful disadvantage in that green dress, green tippet (lined with ermine), and green capote bonnet, made up into a point, with a white aigrette on the summit. But who could think of the attire, when the young face and figure expressed so much spirit, beauty, amiable girlish feeling, happiness, and health? The two bouquets presented to her were received with the ease of one used to such tributes, but who is not yet blasé. That of Mlle. de Stiers was of roses and orchids. The orange ribbon fastening it jarred with the delicate tints of the flowers.

It was not easy to see the Regent's face, a pair of large green spectacles and a high furred collar hiding it. Her eyes were never strong, and she must protect them to bear travelling. She is stout, staid, and sterling. Her life has been made up of patience and conscientious attention to all her duties, great and small. I am told that she has the enjoyment for life of a large private fortune. The late King of the Netherlands came into the enormous wealth of his brother, Prince Henry. The latter, as it was chiefly personalty, made a will, it was supposed, in favour of his second wife, a sister of the Duchess of Connaught. But this will could not be found after his death, and the heritage went to the late King.

The two Queens have a following of six gentlemen and two ladies, with men servants and femmes de chambre. But there is no governess. Their Majesties are inseparable. They rise betimes in the morning, and go to bed early. Their visit to the Louvre took place before that Museum was open, and they had to wait some time at the door. Her youthful Majesty was in a beige woollen dress, with plush jacket and grey felt hat trimmed with blue velvet. She was taken to the Italian Galleries. When she saw the Joconda she exclaimed, "I think she's like me." Wilhelmina speaks French without a foreign accent. She has had the joy of replenishing her wardrobe in the Rue de la Paix, and of ordering of a jeweller there a wedding present for the Princess Alexandrina of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. At the wedding of that Princess she will find quite an assortment of Princes ready to devote themselves to her. The announcement of an engagement with Prince Bernhard of Saxe-Weimar, grandson of Princess Sophie of the Netherlands, is contradicted. The Dutch do not like the idea of a German husband. As the sons of the Crown Princess of Denmark have a Dutch grandmother in their pedigree, Prince Harald, the third, now in his twenty-second year, would be acceptable. The nicest marriageable Prince of a Protestant House in Europe is Eugène of Sweden. He has conduct, engaging manners, and is highly educated. But as he is an artist, perhaps the Dutch might not think him a serious candidate, were he to come forward. He works like a professional painter. As, however, the Netherlands no longer have a history, devotion to his art should not disqualify him. Every one who knows Prince Eugène likes him, and thinks well of him. He is a first cousin of Queen Emma.

"Martyre," Richepin's new play, deals with the birth of Christianity in Rome. It sets up to a sort of sentimental piety, but the author must have laughed in his sleeve as he wrote. Were I not afraid of making Richepin angry, I should say that religious emotions of Flammiola (Bartet) come within the sphere of Doctor Charcot. She is gained to Christianity by Johannes, a prophet preacher of the first century (Mounet-Sully). Her motives are a good deal mixed. Like most Romans of her time, she suffers from that weariness of life that came of over-eating. She mistakes hysteria for piety—and so does the author. Her religious fervour shows itself in running after Mounet-Sully, who shows a splendid pair of legs and arms (quite bare), and has inspired Flammiola with an unconquerable passion. She believes she is subjugated by the doctrine of the Cross, though the other motive constantly appears. Mounet-Sully, in order to develop the muscles of his legs and arms, has been months in training. During that time he gave up tea, coffee, wine, beer, and cigars. It was worth while doing so, inasmuch as all was to lead up to his being crucified in the amphitheatre in Rome. Nothing could be more realistic than the crucifixion drop-curtain scene. Let Ober Ammergau hide its head! All, or nearly all, the ladies kept exclaiming as they watched the contorted muscles, "C'est affreux! Mais, c'est affreux!" But all the same they were delighted at the shocks their nerves received. Mounet-Sully was ghastly. He was master of larynx muscles, countenance, and the very hair of his head when he writhed and cried, "À boire, à boire!" Bartet tried to tone down her hysterical part. The agony can be piled no higher when Johannes recognises Flammiola. She, mad with grief and nerves, declares herself a Christian to the Prætor, and wants to be crucified also. The magistrate will take her at her word. But her faithful slave, by stabbing her, saves her from the shame of the cross. She crawls to the one on which Johannes hangs. His blood baptizes her, and she puts, as he exhorts her, her whole trust in Christ. All the slaves, centurions, and other Roman characters are mere padding and an excuse for the costumier. The Christian congregation of Johannes are the halt, the maimed, the blind, the crippled, the ulcerated. They seem the kind of beings that infested the Cour des Miracles. This drama is meant for exportation. It is one to attract the morbid of both sexes.

The Duc d'Ursel, who married Mlle. de Franqueville last week, is Governor of Hainault, and a nephew of Comte de Mun. He is gentlemanly. One thinks him un peu effacé. But the very careful education he received has not rubbed out all his originality, and it has certainly given him the desire not to make a selfish use of his advantages. Mlle. de Franqueville is daughter of Comte de Franqueville, member of the Institute and also of the Cobden Club. He is a close, clever speaker, but his speeches are few and far between. His wife, née Schœffer-Erard is the principal shareholder of the great piano-manufacturing firm. Her enormous wealth enables her to keep the garden and grounds of La Muette as they were when that place was a Royal hunting lodge. I should say those long avenues, shaded with venerable trees, that one sees from the Avenue Henri Martin, are worth 1,000 francs a yard. There are three, forming a fan, with pleasure grounds between. Erard bought this estate on the morrow of the Revolution of 1830 at a ridiculously low price. The Catholic ceremony at the Ursel-Franqueville wedding took place in the drawing-room of the Château de La Muette. As the Marquis de Mun, the bridegroom's father, died so recently, it was a purely family affair.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THERE is little intelligence, dear Lady Betty in "The Latest Intelligence." The following extracts from the leading London papers are, therefore, more entertaining than instructive:—

Rumours of Ship Purchases.

Our Deptford correspondent telegraphs:—A report is current here this morning to the effect that proposals have been made to the Thames Navigation Company for the purchase of one or two of their penny steamboats in connection with the probable outbreak of hostilities between Spain and America. It is understood that the negotiations are on behalf of the United States Government.

Attitude of the Powers.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Monte Carlo, April 16.

Commenting to-day on the Spanish American crisis, the Monte Carlo Croupier says:—"There is no room for further European intervention, and the watchword is, complete neutrality. But after the war, and on the day when the final accounts are being prepared, Monaco may make its voice heard."

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, April 16.

It is generally foreseen that, were the United States to annex Cuba, the Americans would certainly cultivate brown-paper instead of the tobacco plant. In the interests of the millions of smokers the European Governments have, therefore, decided to take concerted action to prevent the United States from occupying the island permanently.

Our representative, in consequence of the foregoing serious report, had an interview to-day with one of the Secretaries of the French Embassy at Albert Gate. The latter stated that no official confirmation of the report had reached the Embassy, and, with diplomatic tact, assured our representative that he felt convinced that were Americans to substitute brown-paper for the tobacco leaf in the manufacture of Havanna cigars, they would, as befitted the members of so great and so honoured a nation, place a most wholesome and admirable article upon the market. He, however, added that personally, acting solely upon medical advice, he would continue to smoke exclusively cigars composed of tobacco. This important statement is deserving of the utmost consideration, since it tends to show that France, whilst harbouring very friendly sentiments towards the United States, will not permit her own interests to be interfered with in any respect.

Our representative then called at the Russian Embassy, in Chesham-place, but was unable to obtain an interview either with the Ambassador or with any member of the staff. He had, however, some words with the second footman, who observed the utmost reticence, being evidently anxious not to commit the Czar by any indiscreet expression of opinion.

After this, our representative proceeded to the German Embassy, but the Ambassador and the entire personnel are absent, as the house is in the hands of the decorators, in preparation for the approaching London season. Fortunately our representative was enabled to hold a short conversation with one of the workmen employed on the premises, who, in answer to a direct question, replied:—"Well, guv'nor, I am in favour of the government of Cuba by the United States for Spain." The importance of this declaration is obvious, as the policy which it advocates affords the easiest solution of the difficult problem. Our representative inquired whether he would have a glass of sherry or a brandy cocktail, to which the man answered: "Thankee, but I think a pint of bitter would suit me best." This proves that Germany does not propose to entangle herself in the quarrel either on the side of Spain, or on that of the United States, but that she is especially anxious to draw closer the bonds which bind her to Great Britain.

Edison and Electricity.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Washington, April 16.

The War Minister is in continual communication with Mr. Edison, who, it is said, has completed many contrivances for the use of electricity for destructive purposes should war ensue between the States and Spain. Amongst other plans, it has been decided to attach miniature torpedoes, charged with a new and most violent explosive, to the tails of all the fish in American and Cuban waters.

Certain journals of the extreme "Yellow" type advocate the despatch of a detachment of American "heiresses" to subdue Spain, but the moderate papers oppose the proposal as being too barbarous, and, therefore, likely to elicit the strongly expressed disapproval of the civilised world. The "Yellow" Press in reply to this maintains that America is not concerned with civilisation. Cuba must be freed at whatever cost to the Cubans.

Mr. Edison is also constructing an enormous wind producing machine which is to be established at Key West. The powerful gusts generated by this instrument, and directed towards Cuba, will be charged with electricity, so that, sweeping the island, they will extinguish all life, whether human, animal, or vegetable. The Cubans must be freed.

A vast ram is, moreover, to be erected at the extreme end of Key West towards Cuba, and Mr. Edison proposes, by merely touching a button in his laboratory, to move the Continent of America so as to bring it into collision with Cuba, when the force of the impact must demolish that island. America is determined to free Cuba, even if in doing so she has to exterminate the entire Cuban race.

Congress Unanimous.

Washington, Later.

Congress is unanimous; Congress will not fight.

The Reserves to be Called Out.

New York, April 17.

It is denied that the reserves are to be called out. It is officially declared that in America there is no reserve.

The Commissariat Complete.

Washington, Later.

War is inevitable and imminent. Enormous supplies of brandy-cocktails and gin slings have been despatched to the front. The entire adult male population will follow immediately. The utmost enthusiasm prevails.

(from our own correspondent).

Key West, April 19.

The entire American Army has assembled here: 10,000,000 men. The Commander-in-Chief has just addressed them. He spoke into the receiver of a telephone, with which instrument every man was connected by a separate wire. It was a most impressive ceremony. The Commander-in-Chief said:—"Fellow Citizens, — A beneficent Government has entrusted you with fire-arms. I have but one earnest request to make: for heaven's sake, do not load them."

Is it not time that our bills of fare should be written in English? A few well-known dishes figure always under the same names, but, otherwise, every cook calls his concoctions much as he or she pleases. Most men who are sufficiently honest would admit that they frequently select dishes named on the bills of fare without being absolutely certain of their composition. Then why continue a system which does not offer any very evident advantages? At one period no English singer was sufficiently brave to appear before the British public under his or her own name, but, in order to obtain a hearing, found it necessary to add an "o" or an "e" to the ending, so as to suggest an Italian origin. Three-fourths of the dressmakers in London are English, but the majority of them describe themselves as "Madame" this or that. These obvious deceptions are ridiculous. As regards the description of dishes, however, there can be no rational excuse for puzzling those who consult the bills of fare, as not even the most learned in the art of gastronomy could now say with certainty what the items named in these are composed of.

Attention was called last week in these columns to several legacies and gifts which charitable institutions in Great Britain had recently received, the total amounting to £138,150. By an error of the printer it was stated that Mr. Hope Morley had given £4,000, and that the late Mr. George Congreve had bequeathed £500. Mr. Morley gave the £500, while the £4,000 was bequeathed by Mr. Congreve. This week it is announced that the late Sir John Arnott has bequeathed £40,000, to be distributed between various charitable institutions in Cork and Dublin. A correspondent has gone somewhat deeply into the matter suggested by the remarks referred to, and he has calculated that over a quarter of a million is handed over every week to charitable institutions in Great Britain. If that is so, it is difficult to account for the fact that the Prince of Wales's Jubilee Hospital Fund has not received more substantial support than it has. As summer is approaching, the attention of the charitably-disposed should be called to the Children's Country Holiday Fund, of which Mr. Samuel Barnett is the chairman, and whose offices are at 10, Buckingham-street, Strand. Thirty thousand children are looking forward with indescribable longing to breathe the fresh air of the country again, and once more to see the green fields. In modern England the children seldom ask in vain if their requests are reasonable, and it is to be hoped that all who can afford to contribute towards this admirable fund will do so.—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THE Craven Meeting afforded the most interesting racing that has been seen this year, and the week was as fertile in surprises as usual. I predicted some time ago that Jeddah would win the Craven Stakes, which was absurdly enough made the last event on the card on Friday (it ought to have been the first race), but the performance was not brilliant. Jeddah was backward, but so were most of his opponents, and the pace was very bad. The defeat of Cyllene for the Column Stakes (with long odds recklessly betted on him) was the tragedy of the week. It is said that Mr. Rose's colt was "chopped" at the start, and certainly there ought to be some good excuse for him, but he is far from fit, and it would have been a wiser course to have rattled him along in his work and kept him for the Newmarket Stakes. It is certainly a misfortune for the bookmakers that Cyllene is not engaged in the Derby, as he would have been a great winter favourite, and his backers would now have been looking miserably blue. The Biennial running proved that Leisure Hour cannot stay, but he will win a T.Y.C. race before long. St. Maur will do better a little later on, and he ran like a stayer.

The odds on Tarbolton for the four-year-old Biennial should have been 6 to 1 instead of merely 6 to 4, as he was the only animal in the field that had any pretension to be in racing condition, so it was no wonder that he won in a trot.

I predicted last week that Prince Soltykoff would soon win an "overnight" race at Newmarket with Crucianella, and on the day after Truth was published she carried off a Maiden Plate, winning in a common canter. The best two-year-olds that ran at Newmarket were Sister Angela (who was highly tried before Lincoln) and Peterero, who was a general tip for the Ashley Plate.

A great many fairy tales have appeared in the papers about the "tempting offers" which Mr. Houldsworth is alleged to have received for Springfield. The fact is that, so far from Mr. Houldsworth having "refused £20,000" for Springfield, he never once received a direct offer for the horse from any responsible person. It is quite enough for some impecunious mooncalf to jabber about the £10,000 or £20,000 which a notable horse is worth in his opinion, for some gullible reporter to announce that the price mentioned has been offered and refused. It would be a good thing if editors of sporting papers would refuse to print fairy tales of this kind unless they are convinced that the alleged offerer was in a position to complete the purchase if his proposal had been accepted.

Some of the sporting papers would always persist in writing of the late Mr. Bass as "the Hon. Hamar Bass," and they might just as well have added the letters "K.G." to his name. He has also been described as next heir to the Barony of Burton, which was conferred upon his elder brother about twelve years ago. Mr. Hamar Bass was heir to his brother's baronetcy, under a special remainder, but the peerage will pass to Lord Burton's only child, Mrs. Baillie of Dochfour.

Mr. Bass wasted an immense amount of money in buying high-priced yearlings, scarcely one of which ever earned a tithe of its purchase money, and his lack of success was much to be regretted, as his system of racing was an excellent one. He disdained betting, and usually kept his horses for high-class races, the result being that he often opposed one of the flyers of the day with a beast that would have been a costly purchase at £100, so that many a time his enterprise at least stopped a walk over. Mr. Bass won two of the richest handicaps ever run with Rusticus, who was a mere plater, and he carried off the Goodwood Stakes with Carlton Grange, while the Cesarewitch of 1895 was at his mercy if Aborigine had kept on his legs. The best horse ever owned by Mr. Bass was Love Wisely, who won him the Ascot Cup in 1896, and also last year's Jockey Club Stakes of £10,000, in which race he made a dreadful show of Velasquez. Mr. Bass was keenly interested in racing all his life, and his Turf career commenced with an unsuccessful plunge on Christmas Carol, who finished second to Gladiateur for the Derby in 1865, a disastrous dash which brought him into disgrace at home, as Mr. Michael Bass detested the Turf and everything connected with it. Mr. Bass was certainly an "all round" sportsman, as he was for many years Master of the Meynell Hunt, being also prominent as a courser, in addition to his racing. He did not care so much for shooting of any kind as for salmon fishing, which was his favourite amusement, and he had for the last three years rented Lord Lansdowne's celebrated Meikleour Water in the Tay.

There was a very good field for the Lancashire Steeplechase of £1,000 at Manchester, including Drogheda, winner of the Grand National, but he had nothing to do with the finish. Keelson, who was ridiculously handicapped, won in a common trot. This horse was bred by Lord Zetland, for whom he won some good races as a two-year-old, and he finished second to Speedwell for the Middle Park Plate. Keelson, having apparently turned rogue, was sold by Lord Zetland to Mr. Cunningham, who has done remarkably well with him, and this animal affords another example of the fact that a well-bred horse that has shown good form, but which has become of no use on the flat, frequently develops into a brilliant performer in hurdle races and steeplechases.

The winter prediction that Regret would pay for following in hurdle races has been abundantly justified, and at Manchester this horse won the £1,000 hurdle race in a canter, after having made all the running, with 11 st. 10 lb. on his back. Regret is undoubtedly a flyer when in the mood to do his best. Two years ago, when this horse was owned by the Duke of Westminster, he was a prominent favourite for the Derby, but he could never fairly stay beyond six furlongs on the flat, and the fatuous blunder of pertinaciously training him for long-distance races ruined him for the time, and appears to have permanently impaired his temper.

Sefton Lodge, the well-known residence of the late Duchess Dowager of Montrose at Newmarket, has been sold to Mr. Leonard Brassey. Sefton Lodge was built in 1873 by the late M. Lefevre, and after his departure from England, Mr. Stirling-Crawfurd became the owner, and he left it to his widow, who bequeathed the property to her son, the present Duke of Montrose. Sefton Lodge has been since tenanted by Mr. McCalmont and Mr. Rucker successively. The house was built, regardless of cost, by M. Lefevre, and an immense amount of money was afterwards expended on the place by the Duchess Dowager, whose final work was the erection of a memorial church on the outskirts of the property, and in the enclosure belonging to that edifice her Grace and Mr. Stirling-Crawfurd are buried. The Bishop of Ely objected to consecrate this church until a picture which had been placed in it by the builder had been removed, but the Episcopal scruples were overcome by the dexterity of the Duchess Dowager, who took away the picture on the day before the service, and hung it up again on the day afterwards. There was another bother about the endowment, as the Bishop of the diocese had justly decided that the stipend must be guaranteed in a satisfactory way, instead of the incumbent's income depending upon chance.

Ravensdale was very heavily backed at Kempton Park last week, and his wretched running clearly proves that the view which TRUTH was alone in taking after Lincoln of this horse was correct. I then ridiculed the notion that he would turn out a good thing for the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap, and it is difficult to understand by what hocus-pocus many people were so infatuated as to regard this horse's performances at Lincoln as justifying the expectation that he would win a big race. I suspect that Ravensdale is a rogue. Jaquemart was mentioned by me some time ago as being likely to win a good handicap, and I had expected he would "go for" the Chester Cup, but his bad running at Northampton disclosed the fact that he cannot stay, so he was wisely slipped for the £1,000 race at Kempton Park, which he won very cleverly. Northern Farmer, who was well backed, cannot stay a mile, and Mr. Bottomley will do well to study the art of placing horses if he intends to succeed with his stud. An animal which is useless in second-class company may carry all before him if he is relegated to a lower grade of competitors, and in the same way a horse that is Gulliver in Brobdingnag at a mile, is often transformed into Gulliver in Lilliput at six furlongs.

I hear that Mr. Bass's stud will be sold off by Messrs. Tattersall, without reserve, on May 11, being the Wednesday in the Second Spring Meeting.

It will probably be soon decided that the three-year-olds are an exceedingly moderate lot, and the public form exhibited up to the present time has been contemptible. After the wretched collapse of Cyllene the Newmarket Stakes ought to be a good thing for Hermiston, unless the Two Thousand running discovers a flyer, and there will have to be a magical transformation in Mr. Rose's disappointing colt if he is to develop into a worthy opponent of Galtee More for the Ascot Cup. The Baker's ailment is more than ever to be regretted after the victory of King's Messenger, to whom Sir John Kelk's colt gave 14 lb. and a handsome beating at Doncaster last September, and Lord Penrhyn's steed was much fancied on that occasion, as he started first favourite at 4 to 1 in a field of nineteen.

The trial of Ninus, about which such an elaborate noise was raised, was all nonsense and rubbish. Prince Soltykoff's colt is remarkably good-looking and a fine galloper, but I do not believe he can be made thoroughly fit to run for such a race as the Two Thousand by Wednesday next, and we have yet to learn that Ninus can stay the R.M. Remembrances of the performances of The Nipper are not calculated to justify the expectation that stamina will be the strong point of Ninus, who is his own brother. Brio has been as much liked as any horse at Newmarket by those who watched last week's gallops, but it is now said that Mr. Baird's colt will be reserved for the Derby, and it is certain that he will be benefited by time. Jeddah is still backward, but he had to be desperately ridden to win his race on Friday, and, with Carhaix beaten for the Wood Ditton Stakes, and Dieudonné to be kept for the Derby (a very wise decision of the Duke of Devonshire), the prospects of Egerton Lodge for next week's race are by no means bright. Orzil was tried over a mile at Newmarket on Friday on the Limekilns, and he won easily. If Orzil can really stay the R.M. he ought to beat all the Newmarket lot next week; but Disraeli is very much fancied there, and so is St. Evox, of which pair I decidedly prefer the former. Dunlop will be found a non-stayer, the dark Wantage is not class enough, although a useful colt, and there is no encouragement for any one to back Wildfowler after his dismal exhibition at Derby. I do not fancy Hawfinch, and neither Carhaix nor Schonberg can have a thousand to one chance after their running last week. I shall predict the victory of Batt if he wins his trial, and of the result of this gallop the market will afford clear indication. One cannot depend upon the stamina of a single one of the Newmarket lot, except Jeddah.

I will deal next week with the One Thousand, for which race Ebba (sister to Ladas) will be Lord Rosebery's best, as she easily defeated Mauchline and Fructidor in a trial on Friday over the R.M.

The Duke of Westminster may win the Hastings Plate on Tuesday with Calveley, who will then be in better trim for racing than he was last week.

CYCLING AND CHURCHGOING.

Bishop Stubbs, the Lord Bishop of Oxford, has been lecturing the good people of Maidenhead on the wickedness of Sunday cycling and boating. I can quite understand, in such a town, where Sunday is a busy day, the danger of religious services being relegated to a very back seat. At the same time, neither cyclists nor river folk are deserving of such universal censure as the Bishop is reported to have indulged in. I cannot see that cycling on Sunday is an enormity. As a mere means of getting to and from church it has great advantages, provided the parsons are sufficiently alive to their responsibilities to supply accommodation for machines. The wood and asphalte streets of the metropolis are not bad riding, and it would not take a great change in fashion before a good many people would find a ride to service at a well-known City church a very agreeable exercise. The bicycle needs no watering or feeding. The rider does not employ 'buses or cabs. The majority avoid the railway. The ordinary Sunday traveller gives employment to many more people than the cyclists. Then, too, Sunday is the only day on which thousands of young men and women who are employed in shops or in offices can leave London and get a breath of country air. As a means of healthy recreation, the bicycle has been to many of this class a priceless blessing. If the bishops and clergy who condemn Sunday cycling were to serve behind the counter for a few weeks, and live on the pay of a shop assistant, I feel sure they would prefer a Sunday on their bicycles in the country, and find themselves better for it than if they had stayed in town and listened to the rhetoric of the local rector. Far be it from me to suggest that people should not go to church on Sunday. They can do that and bicycle as well. The bicycle is not a devil's gift when used on a Sunday. The one little point the parsons omit to notice is whether or not the cyclists make any difference to church attendance. If there were no bicycles would their riders go to church? Their doings on Sunday on a bicycle bring them into notoriety, but for every person one sees on a bicycle how many does one meet in the street? If the non-cycling section of the community attended church regularly the number of churches would have to be doubled.

Let me carry the war into the parsons' camp. It is not nearly so much the bicycle as the parson that drives people from church. There is nothing that empties the church so much as the wretched system of sermons. Every parson is supposed to be able to preach. He has no open critics, and if he is put into a good living no amount of incompetency in the pulpit will affect his income. And yet parsons expect people who are busy all the week to sit and listen to their painful prosings or their pompous platitudes for intervals varying from fifteen to forty minutes every Sunday. No wonder men stay away and children grow weary of church, determining to give it up as soon as they are old enough to act for themselves. If the bishops would teach their clergy that brevity is not only the soul of wit but the salvation of sermons they would do a great deal more good for the Church than they will ever do by any amount of diatribes against the healthy and harmless exercise of Sunday cycling.

So far as his financial affairs are concerned, Roberts, the champion billiard player, has fallen on evil times. But these disturbing circumstances have enabled him to demonstrate the brilliancy of his powers as a billiard player. His hostile critics have had to sing small. I care not whether he could, if each man exerted himself to the utmost, give the points he does. The fact remains that, despite his fifty years, he is head and shoulders above the rest. He could not play, said his enemies, without the push-stroke. He not only does so, but increases his own record in nearly every match he plays. Then his own tables helped him. Now the tables are not his, and are measured to the Association standard, and it is on these tables he has been making big breaks. Against Diggle last week he made the record of 679 push- and spot-barred.

There seemed a bigger crowd than ever at the Crystal Palace to see the final tie for the Association Cup. But the turnstiles told a different tale. If the football on such occasions is not first-class there is always plenty to amuse one in the crowd. It is the one day in the year when the provinces invade London. They congregate together and make their presence felt, and so one gets quaint glimpses of provincial life and ideas. The people came in their thousands from Derby and Nottingham. In each town the day was treated as a public holiday, and shops and factories were closed. The Londoner might smile when the visitors mistook Battersea Bridge for the one at the Tower, or gazed in wonderment at the traffic in the Strand. But with what pitying will these provincials regard the poor Cockney on the football ground! He, poor fool, does not know each player in both teams by sight. He cannot tell who tackles or dribbles. No, the men of Derby and Notts regard the Londoners as poor things who scarcely know the joys of life. But to get to the game. Southerners, at all events, hoped Derby would win. They felt that Notts Forest were in the final on sufferance. Southampton ought to have been playing. Hence the tumultuous cheering and the waving of black and white flags and umbrellas when Bloomer equalised for the County. From an early stage of the play it was evident that there would be only one team in it. The Notts defence was admirably strong. The County forwards dallied with the ball and time after time had it taken away from them by the opposing halves and backs. The Derby forwards on the whole had more of the game, but their work lacked grit and determination. In the second half, for a long time they attacked strongly, but the Notts men kept them at bay, and when they in their turn got to the Derby goal just before the close of play they quickly scored a goal. It is all very well to say Derby had bad luck in not scoring, but the fact was that the opposing backs were too good for them, and whenever danger threatened, the whole of their opponents seemed to pack in goal. Their forwards, too, were quicker on the ball, and passed longer and more accurately than those of Derby. There is not a shadow of doubt that the best team won, and the losers cannot throw the blame on any individual player. Neither team had been in the final before. Notts Forest have just attained their majority, being twenty-one years old. Their victory is a happy omen. Derby's failure saved an enterprising local tailor from giving each player a new suit to measure. Such are the uses of advertisement and adversity. It is a quaint sense of humour that enables the vendors of funeral cards in memory of the defeated team to find a ready sale for their wares. With them it is only a question which of two packets shall be opened. The winners' supporters purchase these grim mementoes eagerly.

It is very satisfactory that the new rules regulating Army football competitions are having a wholesome effect. I have not, unfortunately, a copy of these rules, but in them, I believe, several evils to which I called attention a season or two ago are dealt with. Men can no longer exchange from one regiment to another because they may strengthen a team, nor are teams now allowed to go off duty for training as has been the case in the past. These changes may have something to do with the defeat of the Portsmouth R.A. in the Army cup final. It was played on Bank Holiday at Aldershot, and the success of the Gordon Highlanders was immensely popular. Then in the Cavalry cup final the winners were the 12th Lancers, but the cup has been awarded to their opponents the Royal Horse Guards (Blues). The winners had played a man who had recently exchanged, and now a three years' qualification is required. The holders would rather play again than keep the cup under such circumstances. This is a good sporting spirit, but if they do not keep it the whole competition ought, in fairness to other teams that have been beaten, to be replayed. This cannot be done. In the Middlesex Senior Cup the 2nd Scots Guards defeated Brentford, to the great disappointment of the latter, who have lodged a protest.

Athletic meetings in the suburbs are now few and far between. Old-established ones like Erith have been abandoned. It is, therefore, pleasant to find the meeting at Surbiton still prospering. With proper programmes for schoolboys and others, and with good invitation open events, these gatherings can be made pleasant and interesting. In the open quarter Coltart was successful, and in the two miles the veteran Munroe only just failed to catch young Dixon, with 320 yards start. Munroe's time was 9 min. 41 sec. Being unable to go to the Oval owing to the rebuilding there, the South London Harriers held their spring meeting at the Croydon Football ground and got a good gate. Gerdes, the Oxford blue, won the sprint from a short mark in good time. The time in the three miles handicap, which was won by Byrne, was fast enough for an Inter-University meeting.

At Easter time there is always plenty of golf. The chief event was the spring meeting of the Royal St. George's at Sandwich. The handicapping made the events close and interesting. In the foursome competition it was only after a tie at the twentieth hole that Grosvenor and Caird beat the Messrs. Smith. The Cinque Ports Gold Medal was won by Hambro, with Caird second, but he won the spring medal, the Mills Cup, and Saunders Bowl. His handicap of ten will suffer. There was also a splendid match between F. G. Tait and A. D. Blyth. At the end of the first round the latter was one up, and Tait won at the last hole of the second round, Blyth failing at his putt. Even cracks are mortal, which was demonstrated at Seaford when the local man White was beaten by Braid. Both were off their game on the green, and in the return game White was fearfully nervous. In contrast to these exhibition games is the professional foursome match between Simpson and Sayers, who play Herd and Kircaldy. There is money up, and there is a deadly earnestness about the game which can only be realised by those who witness the play. The first half of the match was played at Balgownie, and Herd and his partner have three holes to their credit when they play the last stage at St. Andrews.

The Mediterranean is rapidly producing the most exciting yacht racing. The reason is not far to seek. The money is lavishly spent in prizes. The prize-money for the big boats runs into hundreds, and reaches to a thousand pounds. The Bona and Satanita showed excellent sport, and the latter in strong winds was invincible. The former secured nine winning flags to her opponent's six. The Satanita comes home to be converted into a yawl. Cannot our English yachtsmen spend enough money to make it worth owners' while to race big yachts in home waters?

Sunday]

MY DEAR BEN,—Another week has elapsed and war between Spain and the United States has not yet broken out; neither are we nearer a settlement. On the contrary, latest events in Washington in the shape of the passing by the Senate and the House of Representatives of warlike resolutions appear to render hostilities inevitable. It has been evident for some time that Spain would not and could not make such concessions as would satisfy the American Jingoes, who are now in control, and thus one cannot help expressing the view that if war cannot be avoided, it would be best for everybody that it should break out at once and let the sword cut the Gordian knot.

Stock Markets Nervous—War Inevitable.

There are now few people left in Europe who are still retaining a faint hope that peace may be preserved. The Stock Exchanges and Bourses, at all events, have come to the conclusion that it is best to prepare for the worst, and we have now war markets and war prices. It is true that the Bank rate has as yet not been raised above 4 per cent., but even an advance to 5 per cent. is more or less discounted, and we have been familiarised so long with the prospect of war breaking out, that the actual declaration is not likely to give any very severe shock to the Stock Markets. How greatly business has been curtailed of late appeared clearly at the fortnightly settlement which has just been concluded. There is practically no speculative "Bull" account in existence. In fact, considerable "Bear" commitments have evidently been entered into. This was shown by the exceedingly light rates charged, notwithstanding the rise in the Bank rate, backwardations being in fact exacted in the case of several Home Railway stocks. Were any proof wanted of the existence of a considerable "short" account, it would be furnished by the fitful recoveries which take place every now and then on the publication of any favourable rumour, however far-fetched it may be. Thus, on Friday we had quite a "Bear" skedaddle in American Rails, and in some of the other departments, on the report that two of the insurgent leaders had declared themselves ready to accept autonomy for Cuba from the Spanish Government. Of course, the rally soon fizzled out again, when, next day, the political outlook was shown to be as grave as before. I am dealing with the probabilities of the American market elsewhere, but I should like to point out that, beyond a further hardening of the Money Market, the other departments have nothing to fear from the outbreak of war, and, after all, there must be some limit even to the United States taking gold from this country. War has, moreover, been discounted in the Home Railway, South American, and Mining Markets, while both in the Kaffir Circus and in the Westralian section the intrinsic position is sound, the mining industry making good progress both in the Transvaal and in Western Australia. I should therefore expect that, after a few days, these other departments would shake themselves free from the influence of the war scare, and that business would again assume normal proportions, as contrasted with the utter stagnation which is caused by the present state of uncertainty. I am not so sanguine as to South and Central American securities, which may show inactivity for some time to come. There is one favourable circumstance which should not be lost sight of, viz., the distinct improvement of the political outlook apart from the Spanish-American trouble. There are strong indications of a rapprochement between this country and Germany, the Emperor William apparently being inclined to follow up his complimentary telegrams concerning the Atbara victory with other expressions of goodwill. Then, again, the relations of this country with Russia are improving, and as a factor of anxiety the Chinese question no longer counts. All this is forgotten over the impending outbreak of hostilities in the Western Hemisphere, but it will tend to improve matters when once the dread declaration of war has been made.

Money and Gilt-Edged Investments.

The future of the Money Market is at present being discussed with the greatest interest. Last Thursday already another advance in the Bank rate to 5 per cent. was expected in many quarters, and it will certainly take place as soon as war is declared. The action of the directors of the Bank in protecting its stock of gold is generally approved, and it may well be that a 5 per cent. rate will suffice, especially as the United States will, in their own interests, be anxious not to raise the official minimum in London unduly. There is, moreover, on the way to this country, from various parts of the world, a sum of something like £4,000,000 sterling, and a 5 per cent. rate would doubtless attract more. In the meantime, rates in the outside market are approaching the official figure, and although no more than 2½ per cent. is charged for call loans, three months' bank bills are not taken under 3¾ to 3⅞ per cent. Easy money is, of course, quite out of the question for some time to come, especially as trade is active and likely to remain so—war or no war. That under these circumstances gilt-edged investment securities should display a tendency to give way is not surprising. To begin with, Consols have fallen somewhat heavily to 110¾ for the account, owing chiefly to sales as a hedge against "Bull" commitments in other stocks. There has also been of late a further easing-off in the prices of Colonial bonds, British Corporation and Home Railway Debenture and Preference stocks, and one of the results of the graver outlook has been a fall in the new Chinese loan to 1⅝ discount, after it had recovered to 1¼ discount. The Chinese loans generally are somewhat lower, the Seven per Cent. Silver at 100, the Six per Cent. Gold at 104½, the Five per Cent. Gold at 98. Silver has not so far experienced the heavy decline which had been predicted should war become inevitable. The quotation is now 25 15/16d., while the price for forward delivery is 25¾d. Experiments, such as the establishment of a gold standard in India, will now no doubt be put off until times are more propitious.

Home Rails.—A Reaction.

Although trade generally remains active, and traffic returns for the week before Easter have, notwithstanding the variable weather, been very satisfactory, Home Rails have continued to be affected by the war rumours. They fluctuate, in fact, with American Rails, and every sharp set back in the latter causes a moderate reaction in Home Railway stocks, the argument being that if war breaks out between the United States and Spain, money will go higher. To a certain extent this is correct, but what must not be forgotten is the great scarcity of stock which was again shown at the last settlement. Thus Brighton "A" were arranged at even, and the backwardation on Great Eastern was ¼ to ⅛, while contangoes on all other stocks were easy. Nor is it likely that real holders of substantial Ordinary or Deferred stocks will be induced by the rise of money to clear out of securities in which they have done so well. It is, on the other hand, explicable that holders of Debenture and Preference securities, which had reached extremely high prices, should at present be tempted to realise. As regards the first batch of the Easter traffics, it was exceedingly satisfactory, the increase amounting to £114,000. The figures show that there was actually a gain of £202,000 in passenger receipts, and a decrease of £88,000 in goods, &c. This brings the total traffic increase for the fourteen weeks up to £598,300. So far, the Great Eastern has done excellently in the Easter week with a gain of £15,500, and while the South Eastern had as much as £15,379 to the good, the Brighton increase amounted to £14,865. The Scotch takes too were satisfactory, but that has not prevented a relapse both in Caledonian Deferred and in North British Deferred, caused entirely by the war scare. Whenever some favourable developments should come about, I look for a sharp recovery in these as well as in Dover "A," the South Eastern making remarkable progress just now. Great Central Preferred and Deferred are easier, but the 1894 Ordinary keeps remarkably firm at 40. Metropolitan Districts have been fairly steady, and I maintain my opinion that these as well as Great Central 1894 Ordinary, are an excellent lock-up. Central London Railway shares have been fairly steady at 10½ for the fully-paid Ordinary.

The Yankee Market.—When Will Bottom be Touched?

What interests operators in, and holders of, American Railroad stocks most at the present juncture is the question as to when the lowest point in these will be reached provided war breaks out. It is obviously impossible to fix a period for the firing of the first shot, but it may be as well to discuss the probable course of events. According to latest advices the United States Congress is almost agreed on the policy to be pursued, and although the Cuban independence resolution may cause some delay, everything now seems to point to the outbreak of hostilities in the next few days. Now, war scares are curious in that they fail to create a strong effect in exact proportion to the frequency in which they happen. The Stock Markets have now been well inured to the sentiment that war is inevitable, and so far the level of prices of American Rails has not yet fallen to the panicky quotations of about a month ago, when, on rumours that Spain had declared war against the United States, Milwaukee dropped at one time to 88¼, Louisville to 46¼. These prices have not been touched since, and, in fact, on the same day, an important recovery occurred. To show exactly the course which quotations have taken lately, I have compiled the following comparative statement:—

It will be seen that since the end of March a fresh fall has taken place, chiefly owing to the view now taken that war is inevitable. It is quite on the cards that on the actual declaration of war a general further decline of from $2 to $5 may be marked in the active list, and an opportunity might thus again be given to buy Milwaukee at about 88, Louisville at about 46. Union Pacifics only the other day dropped to 17 ex rights, and Union Pacific Prefs. have been as low as 49. At anything like these figures it would appear that purchases to a moderate extent should be fairly safe. The declaration of war will doubtless be followed by some dash by the American fleet on Cuba, or on some of the Spanish flotillas, and should our Yankee cousins come off victorious in these, Wall-street would doubtless put stocks up in a jubilant mood. An American reverse, on the other hand, would, of course, bring about corresponding depression. But there can be no doubt that in the end victory must remain with the Americans. Protracted hostilities would naturally cause many American industries to suffer, and thus even the final victory would probably leave the railroads with a somewhat uncertain future, just as a quickly-ended fight would really bring grist to the mills of the Southern roads, and thus such roads as the Louisville and Missouri, Kansas, and Texas would even benefit by the carriage of troops. A great deal will depend, no doubt, upon the respective Admirals, and if Spain were to bring forth a dashing and able leader, the eastern coast of the United States would present many vulnerable points to him. At the same time, the American railroads themselves are not likely to be invaded, and, on the sharp reaction indicated, it would appear to me that Yankee Rails would be a good purchase. The same, of course, applies to the stocks of the Canadian railroads, only more so, for the old adage, "It is an ill wind," here comes into play. Large quantities of goods would be despatched over the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific, so as to be forwarded from Canadian ports to Europe in neutral vessels, and in the same way goods from Europe to the United States will doubtless be despatched by the same route viâ Canada. It is greatly to be regretted that the Commission has separated without effecting a settlement of the Pacific rate-war. It is by no means creditable to the managements and Boards of these roads, and, of all times, the present is not the one in which to quarrel. Of course, Canadian Pacifics have dropped to 81¾, Grand Trunk First Prefs. to 66, the Guaranteed to 73¼. On a declaration of war, and notwithstanding the rate trouble, these stocks should deserve every attention.

Foreigners and South Americans.

It is obvious that the outbreak of war between the United States and Spain would in the first instance affect the more speculative foreign securities which are dealt in by preference on the Paris Bourse. French investors hold Spanish Fours very largely, and there has always been a very considerable gamble in these bonds in Paris chiefly on the "Bull" side. London used to be a chronic "Bear" of Spanish, and unfortunately has not scored in its little gambles, as the haute finance in Paris always came to the rescue. Only during the recent war scares have London operators made money in Spanish, and it is to my knowledge that very large amounts were sold here from 60 downwards, on which considerable profits must have been obtained. During the last few days a rally took place to 44½, from which there has again been a relapse to below 40, and on the outbreak of war we shall no doubt see a further drop. Every fresh decline in Spanish causes some of the other French favourites to ease off, notably Turks, Italians, and Rio Tinto. Greeks have given way, apparently on the postponement of the loan, which has certainly fallen upon very bad times. The war rumours have also affected South American stocks, and although Argentines at one time rallied, they are moving down again. As I have already explained, recent business both in Argentine Government and Railway securities has been largely of a speculative character, and although the "Bull" position has to some extent been relieved, there is still some weakness. I certainly do not advise my readers to part with their holdings now, but fresh purchases should not be made unless a further reaction sets in, and then only if the buyers are able to take up and pay for the stock bought. Mexican Sixes have suffered a moderate set back, but I should be slow to give any credence to the rumours that Mexico proposes to side with Spain. Brazilians have been extremely flat, a further relapse being marked, and this Government will doubtless have to strain every nerve if it proposes to avoid default. Guatemala has again distinguished itself by that objectionable drawback of Spanish-American Republics—of not being able to keep faith with the national creditors. The Guatemalans very coolly reduced the duty on coffee, which is pledged to the foreign creditors, and subsequently merely gave an assurance that other duties would be substituted. It seems to me that Guatemala should be taught a severe lesson with regard to honesty. Uruguay bonds have, on the other hand, remained firm, and would no doubt, under ordinary circumstances, have scored a further improvement. Argentine Railway stocks have been dull, with a tendency to ease off. Whenever favourable developments take place in the general markets, substantial Argentine Railway stocks will doubtless again attract attention, but I fully explained the position last week.

The Kaffir Circus—Ever Recurring Obstacles.

Men connected with the South African department are waxing quite plaintive in their remarks on the course of the Kaffir Circus. They do not agree with the old adage "It is a long lane that has no turning." They say, on the contrary, that the South African road has no turning. There is always something occurring which prevents a recovery in this much-tried market, and now after all the various political troubles seem to have been overcome, and circumstances have arisen which are likely to make Oom Paul much more pliable, there comes the Spanish-American war to unsettle all the markets and with them the South African section. It is a far cry from Cuba to the Transvaal, and, on the face of it, it does not appear at all logical that the Kaffir Circus should be put down with American Rails. Yet this has been the recent experience, the explanation no doubt being the fear that the outbreak of war may cause a further rise in the value of money. It certainly seems that, apart from the Cuban spectre, the outlook in the Kaffir Circus has distinctly improved. I have it, in fact, upon the authority of some of the leading South African houses, that a strong improvement would have come about if the upward movement had not been checked by the war rumours. It is easy to prove this from the fluctuations in prices which have of late taken place. The moment it looked as if peace would be preserved, the active speculative stocks advanced. Thus, Rand Mines, which had dropped to as low as 27, recovered to 29¾, and East Rands and Consolidated Goldfields, which had been considerably below 4, improved to 4¼ to ⅝. Then followed fresh war scares, with the result that Rand Mines are now quoted 28, East Rands 4 1/16, Consolidated Goldfields 4. It is, however, not likely that this state of things will continue. When once war is declared the Kaffir Circus will doubtless steady, and the fact that the speculative account was shown at the last settlement to have been almost reduced to nil is greatly in favour of an improvement. There is also a remnant of a "Bear" account, but I do not think that it is large. On the other hand, the splendid increase in the March output is a very hopeful feature, while matters have also happened of late which place a more encouraging construction upon the political outlook in the Transvaal. For the third or fourth time the announcement is now made, this time under the date of April 16, from Pretoria, that the despatch of the Transvaal Executive, in reply to Mr. Chamberlain's latest communication, has just been handed to the British Agent. President Kruger has evidently been waiting, Micawber-like, for something to turn up in the way of England's political complications, which he might turn to account. In this he has been disappointed. The Chinese question has entered a much more peaceful phase, and there are indications that Russia wishes to proceed in amicable relations with this country. The German Emperor's telegram congratulating the British authorities on the Atbara victory must have been wormwood and gall to Oom Paul, as it shows that the Emperor is anxious to cultivate favourable relations with this country, and to gloss over the effect of his previous congratulatory message to President Kruger. More than that, public opinion in Germany is turning against the objectionable methods of the Transvaal Government. The Cologne Gazette, which has been frequently the exponent of the opinions held by the Berlin Government, has commenced quite a campaign against Boer methods. Under date of the 10th inst., my German contemporary published an interesting article, in which the frank statement is made that people in Germany know now exactly where the screw is loose in the Transvaal, and the advice is given to President Kruger to utilise his present position of power to further the interests of the gold industry, to come to a good understanding with those who are engaged in it, and to pave the way to adaptation of modern conditions. Above all he is advised not to unnecessarily irritate the suzerain power of England. The sting of the article, however, lies in the advice given by the Cologne Gazette not to lend the Boers any money. It appears that an attempt was recently made to obtain a loan in Germany by Transvaal emissaries with unsuccessful results, and that another attempt has been made in a different quarter. This leading article has been followed by a long letter from Johannesburg, published in the Cologne Gazette of the 15th inst., in which a very doleful account is given of the present position of business and consequent lack of enterprise on the Rand. The circumstance that the eyes of the German people are thus being opened to the facts of the real position in the Transvaal will certainly make the attempts of the Transvaal Government to obtain money in Germany exceedingly difficult. While thus matters are generally shaping more favourably to the Kaffir Circus, the fear of war between the United States and Spain depresses quotations. But I am also of opinion that in this instance, too, the actual outbreak of hostilities will render to the South African market its free action again. The chief market feature has been the publication of the report of the British Chartered Company of South Africa, the announcement of a new issue of capital causing a relapse to 2⅝. The market has, however, firmed up again since, and the Directors' report, which is, upon the whole, a business-like document, will doubtless be strengthened at the meeting of shareholders by all manner of favourable statements calculated to secure the success of the new issue of 250,000 shares of £1 each at £2, which it is intended to offer to the shareholders pro ratâ. The total increase in the capital to be authorised is, however, £1,500,000 in £1 shares, thus leaving £1,250,000 for future issue. These will no doubt be administered in several doses at such times as are more especially favourable for such operations. The reports on the progress of the mining industry of Rhodesia contained in this document seem promising, but the weak point is undoubtedly the absence of any crushings on a substantial scale. When the Geelong Company, a subsidiary undertaking of the Matabele Reefs, commences crushing with a 20-stamp battery at the end of May or the commencement of June, however, this question will be decided one way or another. The shares in the substantial Witwatersrand mines have had a steadier tendency, and Randfontein as well as the Barnato stocks were at one time in request, although easing off again on the war scares. Deep Level shares have been fairly steady, although they have not been altogether unaffected by the renewed weakness. Goldfields Deep are quoted 8, Rose Deep 6⅛, Crown Deep 10¾, Jumpers Deep 4⅞, Knight's Deep 1⅝, Nourse Deep 4⅞, Glen Deep 2⅜, Durban-Roodepoort Deep 3¼. By the time this meets the eyes of my readers the remains of the late Mr. Woolf Joel will have been interred at Willesden Cemetery, and I cannot help again expressing my deep-felt sympathy with the family of the deceased, and especially with Mrs. Woolf Joel and her little son, who have returned to this country. My condolences are also due to Mr. Harry Barnato and to Mr. S. B. Joel, who are feeling the loss of their nephew and brother very keenly. Mr. S. B. Joel has returned to this country by the Dunottar Castle, and is stated to hold a very favourable view with regard to the future prospects of the Barnato companies. According to my contemporary, South Africa, Mr. S. B. Joel proposes to return to South Africa after the obsequies of his brother; but his visit will be only a brief one, and he desires eventually to settle in London. Diamond shares have been dull, and De Beers—being a Paris specialty—have been affected by the fall in Spanish, and now stand at $25\frac{3}{16}$. New Jagersfontein are quoted 7⅛.

Golden West Australia.

The chief influence in the West Australian department has also been the fear of the outbreak of war. The public have refrained from purchasing, whilst for some reason or other, best known to themselves, the leaders of some of the principal groups have not supported quotations. This was probably due to a desire to give the "Bears" plenty of rope; and it certainly looks as if this was the underlying sentiment in connection with the Market Trust group, in which strong "Bear" attacks have been the order of the day. Thus, Northern Territories have been sold down to 2½, West Australia Joint-Stock Trust to $1\frac{7}{16}$ xd., ditto Founders' to ¾, West Australia Loan and General Finance to 1¼ xd., and West Australian Market Trust to 14s. 9d. The peculiarity about the position was, however, that while the public refrained from buying, there were all along purchasers on behalf of the group, and it would appear, therefore, that whenever a change comes over the market, those who have been selling "Bears" will find themselves in a tight corner. A moderate reaction has also occurred in the shares of the London and Globe group, Lake View Consols reacting to 8⅞, Ivanhoe to 5, while the various shares in the sub-Companies to be amalgamated stand at ⅜. London and Globe Finance, after a moderate fall, are firmer again at $1\frac{9}{16}$. The return for March of the Lake View Consols of 8,039 oz. of gold is by no means unsatisfactory, as it compares with an output of 7,396 oz. for February. For the month of April the crushing is, moreover, expected to be largely increased by the use of the new filter presses. No fewer than 550 men are now employed on the mine, a number of whom are busy with the erection of machinery, and eventually much higher yields will doubtless be obtained. The following is the long list of crushings which have come to hand during the week:—

A strong attack has been made on the Great Boulder Proprietary, notwithstanding the return in the above list, and the split shares have fallen to 17s. The new shares since the splitting of the old ones have not been popular, and thus the view which I expressed at the time has been fully borne out. But in the present instance unfounded rumours caused the relapse, a scare having been deliberately engineered by reports that the high-grade ore was giving out, and that the mine would shortly have to rely upon low-grade ore, the eyes having been picked out. Rumours of this sort generally take effect only in flat times like the present, and those who propagate them incur a serious responsibility. An official statement has now been made, according to which these reports are absolutely unfounded, and it is asserted that there is a two years' supply of the better-class ore in sight for the present battery. It is pleasant to turn from such unsatisfactory mis-statements to the information given concerning the Hannan's Brownhill at the meeting of the Anglo-Continental Gold Syndicate on Thursday. This Syndicate is interested in the London and Hamburg Gold Recovery Company. The latter undertaking is erecting a plant on the Hannan's Brownhill mine, which should be capable of treating not less than 100 tons of ore per day. Notwithstanding various delays the work of erection has been proceeding rapidly, and Mr. Turner, who presided, stated that they confidently expected the machinery to be running in the course of next month. Mr. Turner also stated that instead of 100 tons per day its daily capacity would probably be about 150, so that the Hannan's Brownhill mine, which has already produced 36,000 oz. of gold from about 8,000 tons of ore, is on the point of becoming one of the largest producers of gold in Western Australia—if not the largest—and the shares are, therefore, expected to appreciate greatly. This is precisely what I was able to state on excellent authority some months ago, and I expect Hannan's Brownhill shares to rise very considerably above the present price of $7\frac{5}{16}$. It is also interesting to learn from the chairman's statements that a trial crushing of 10 tons of ore, which had been made with the view of ascertaining what percentage of gold could be recovered, resulted in a return of 94 per cent., whereas the Company undertook to recover only a minimum of 80 per cent. Sons of Gwalia shares have been a steady market at $2\frac{1}{8}$. East Murchison United, too, have been firmer at 1 on the crushing above referred to, which is particularly noteworthy, as the cost of production on the Great Eastern Lease is only 18s. per ton, and the profit produced by the crushing was £1,600, while on the Donegal Lease the working costs were 37s. per ton, and the profit produced by the crushing was £680. Lady Shenton have been steady at $2\frac{3}{8}$. The latest cablegram from the mine states that the working costs are now only £1 15s. 5d per ton, the reduction having been maintained, as against the mining costs of £2 0s. 9d. per ton in February. As the output of gold for the first quarter of the present year has been 4,068 oz., although during a period of three weeks the machinery was stopped for the purpose of being overhauled, it is not difficult to calculate that a dividend of 1s. 6d. per share has already actually been earned. Thus, provided the yield is maintained, it may be anticipated that dividends amounting to at least 40 per cent. will be paid for 1898, as against 20 per cent. for 1897. Florence shares have been steady at $\frac{5}{8}$, and there is not the slightest doubt that the new lode struck in that property is the Lady Shenton Reef. Golden Horseshoe have dropped to $6\frac{11}{16}$. Brownhill Central are lower at $\frac{15}{16}$, and Associated Southern have declined to $\frac{11}{16}$. Kalgurli were firm at one time on the above-mentioned rich smelting, but have since eased off to $4\frac{13}{16}$. Burbank's Birthday Gift are easier at $1\frac{1}{4}$. I have received several communications from shareholders in Gladiators, Limited, which has been recently reconstructed. My correspondents would like to know whether the shares have all been taken up, whether the reconstruction has been a success, and also the nature of the news that has been received from the mine. The following is one of the communications which I have received :—

> You are aware that Gladiators, Limited, has been recently reconstructed, an assessment on the shares having recently been paid. The resolutions were duly passed and confirmed at the various meetings, but no information has been forthcoming since. I, and no doubt many other shareholders, would like to know whether the shares in the reconstructed Company have all been taken up, and also what the advices from the property are. This Company was started without any public prospectus, and it is well known that there are a large number of vendors' shares. It would be specially interesting to know whether the vendors have taken up their shares in the new undertaking, and whether they have duly paid their quota. As the vendors are, I believe, on very intimate terms with the directors, it is all the more important that some such official statement should be made.

There appears to be no reason why such a statement should not be forthcoming, and I herewith call upon the secretary, Mr. A. B. Beeston, to inform the shareholders as to what proportion of the shares have been taken up, and whether the application money on the vendors' shares has been paid. Some favourable items of cable news bearing upon the W.A. goldfields generally are, firstly, that the railway to the smelting works of the Western Australian Smelting Company has been completed, and, secondly, that Sir John Forrest has promised to erect Government crushing batteries on the North Coolgardie Goldfields as soon as possible. This would give this portion of the goldfields a fresh chance. The warden of the Dundas Goldfield reports that its output during 1897 amounted to 18,163 oz. of gold. The Bird-in-Hand has unfortunately landed in the haven of liquidation, without the possibility of resurrection. I cannot help expressing my surprise at the unreliable character of the reports of the numerous experts, which were of the most glowing description. It will indeed be all the more important to invest only in those mines which are already fully developed, or have reached crushing point. I never have held any favourable opinion of the Murchison (W. A.) Gold Syndicate or of the Lady Forrest (Murchison) Gold Mining Company, and I am not surprised that it should now be found necessary to reconstruct both concerns. The Murchison Syndicate undertook the promotion of the Lady Forrest Company, and does not appear to have been more successful in the other properties and options which it acquired. As regards the Lady Forrest, one cannot help endorsing the remarks made by a shareholder, Mr. Hays, who stated that while in the prospectus it was represented that the mine was a proved and developed property, two and a half years afterwards, after £25,000 had been expended on the property, the Directors should now state that the property had not been properly opened up. I see that consulting committees have been appointed in connection with both the Lady Forrest and the Murchison Gold Syndicate, and it seems to me that as better management is undoubtedly required, the boards should be reconstructed. From the Hannan's Main Reef the following cablegram has been received: "The western crosscut 200 ft. level passed through West Reef, 5 ft. thick, 100 ft. west of the shaft. Will only average 2 dwt. per ton." The experience of our countrymen across the border has not, upon the whole, been a satisfactory one. I need not refer to the various other ventures with which they have been connected, but I cannot refrain from calling attention to the Glasgow Westralian Gold Mines. This concern, whose property is situated in the White Flag district, near Coolgardie, has been in existence for three years, but it has not apparently got hold of any quantity of gold. In this case, too, it has been a case of utterly unreliable reports made by experts.

Indian, Australasian, and British Columbian Mines.

The war clouds have also caused depression in the other mining departments, the Indian section having suffered to a considerable extent. Mysore West, Mysore Wynaad, and Balaghat are lower, and the only improvement has taken place in Ooregum Ordinary and Prefs., which are $\frac{1}{4}$ better. In Australian mines, other than Westralian, Mount Lyell and Mount Lyell North have improved, and there has also been a rise in British Broken Hill to 10s., and in Broken Hill Proprietary to $2\frac{1}{4}$. Charters Towers shares have, however, been weak, and declines are marked in Day Dawn Block, Bonnie Dundee, and New Queen. Aladdin's Lamp are lower, and Mount Morgan have eased off. The death of Mr. Crotty, which was announced on Monday morning, has caused great weakness in the various Mount Lyell properties, Mount Lyell having given way to 13, Mount Lyell North to $2\frac{7}{8}$, Mount Lyell South to 12s., and Mount Lyell West to 11s. New Zealand mines have been very inactive, and shares are difficult to sell. Waitekauri and Taitapu have been more particularly weak. Some quiet buying of Hauraki Associated has taken place between 1s. and 1s. 6d. This is apparently founded on the circumstance that since the completion of the ten-stamp mill the mine has been earning £400 to £500 per month clear profit, which is a very fair return on the capital. According to a cable just received, 30 tons of ore have been crushed for a yield of 271 oz. of gold, of the value of £765, and the cablegram adds that there is a great improvement in the ore that is being exposed. In copper mines, Rio Tinto are distinctly lower at $27\frac{3}{16}$ on Paris sales, and smaller losses are marked in some of the other copper shares. An interesting stage has been reached, from the market point of view, in Utah Consolidated. On Tuesday, the 19th inst., the last payment was made on the new issue of 50,000 shares, and it is supposed that all those who wanted to sell their shares have now done so. Nothing seems to have occurred to justify the decline, and it would not be at all surprising to see a sharp rally. The yield of copper keeps up remarkably well, and I find that during February the return from eleven shipments of ore made to the smelters varied from 11·01 to 12·85 per cent., the amount of silver ranging from 2·2 to 3·25 oz. per ton. These shipments have realised altogether $11,401. As I stated once before, shipments are at present purposely being kept on a moderate scale, pending the erection of the company's own smelting plant. This, I learn, has now been decided upon, a suitable site having been selected. Amongst British Columbians a fair demand has been experienced for London and British Columbia Goldfields at $\frac{3}{16}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ premium, while Whitewater Mines have been dealt in at $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{3}{16}$ premium. Tangier shares have been dealt in at $1\frac{1}{4}$. In connection with the London and British Columbia Goldfields, I ought to correct the statement I made a fortnight ago. The capital of this company is £100,000, in shares of £1 each, on which only 15s. per share has been paid, so that the capital over which the dividend was distributed was £75,000. By the way, the annual report of the Minister of Mines for British Columbia shows that during 1897 very considerable progress has been made in the production of gold. In 1897 the yield of gold was 131,817 oz., against 89,460 oz. in 1896. The production of placer gold has decreased to 25,676 oz. from 27,201 oz.; but, on the other hand, the lode gold has largely increased. Mr. T. R. Hardiman, a well-known resident of Vancouver, has just returned with important British Columbian information. The object of his visit to London is to consult with the Directors of the Associated Gold Mines of British Columbia on the development of something like a hundred mining properties secured for this Company in the districts of Rossland, Kootenay, Slocan, Lillooet, and Yale-Kamploops. It is satisfactory to learn that great importance is attached to the selection of high-class mining experts in British Columbia. Thus it appears that nearly the whole of these mines have been reported upon by Mr. W. Pellew-Harvey, of Vancouver, who has an excellent record, and whose sole services will probably be secured by the Associated Company. Mr. Hardiman is of opinion, which is confirmed by Mr. Harvey, that a number of the mines opened up in 1896 will be made to yield large results in a few months. Klondike and Columbian Goldfields have been firm at $1\frac{1}{4}$-$\frac{3}{8}$, and British America Corporation shares have been dealt in at 19s. 6d. to 20s. According to the Ymir correspondent of the Financial News, the British America Corporation has added to its numerous purchases the Columbia and Kootenay Mine, one of the best-known properties in the immediate vicinity of Rossland. He states that with the cheap smelting charges, which are liable to a further reduction, there is every reason to believe that the ore can be mined at a profit. The British Columbia Mining Critic has the following concerning the well-known Josie Mine, which is now the property of the British America Corporation:—

> Holders of shares in the Josie mine, Rossland, are suffering from disappointment. It was stated that this mine had been sold to the British America Corporation for $300,000, which would yield the shareholders 44 cents per share. However, a circular has been issued, signed by Mr. F. E. Snodgrass, secretary of the Company, stating that the price for which the mine was sold was $261,000. Of this sum, $148,500 have been received by the Company, which leaves a balance of $112,500 due from the British America Corporation. When the debts of the Josie Company are all paid, and the last-named sum is received, there will be $218,846 to be divided among the shareholders. It will net them 31 cents per share.

The Mining Critic adds that not a few Josie holders will receive several cents a share less than the amount of their original purchase-money, so that it is evident that the British America Corporation has been getting in cheap.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new enterprises and issues have been placed before the public during the week:—

Joseph Crossfield & Sons, Limited.—This is an issue of 20,000 (part of an authorised issue of 25,000) Five per Cent. Cumulative pre-Preference shares of £10 each at £11 per share. The Company was formed in 1896 to acquire and carry on the business of Messrs. Joseph Crossfield & Sons, Bank Quay Soap Works, Warrington. The present share capital is £300,000, and there is a Debenture stock issue of £290,000. The whole of the Preference and Ordinary share capital is held by the Directors and members of the Crossfield family.

The Klondike Goldfields, Limited.—The Goldfields of British Columbia, Limited, and the Klondike Mining, Trading, and Transport Corporation, Limited, invite subscriptions to a capital of £350,000 for the purpose of acquiring and developing various properties in the Klondike district, and to carry on business in connection with mining and other operations in the Dominion of Canada or elsewhere.

This issue is more likely to benefit the promoters than the investor. The district may be rich in gold, but it is expensive and difficult to recover. It would be as well to await the result of the developments of some of the other properties in the district.

St. Neots Water Company, Limited.—This Company is formed with a capital of £9,000 in shares of £10 each for the purpose of supplying water within the town of St. Neots, and the parishes of St. Neots Rural and Eynesbury Hardwicke.

Stevenson & Howell, Limited.—This Company takes over as a going concern from January 1, 1898, the business of Messrs. Stevenson & Howell, manufacturing chemists, distillers and importers of essential oils, &c. Share capital £200,000, in Preference and Ordinary shares. The present issue is of 80,000 Five per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares of £1 each.

The Rhymney Iron Scandal.

Some time ago, viz., in October last, I commented upon the position of the Rhymney Iron Company, and on the endeavours of Mr. Samuel Hern, of Cardiff, chairman of the committee, to obtain the fullest information. Amongst the subjects raised at the time in the committee's circular was the erection of a modern steel plant at a cost of £250,000, which was subsequently abandoned. The view was then taken that the loss of this amount of money was due to the want of prescience on the part of Sir Henry Tyler and some of the other members of the Board. Unfortunately, the shareholders in the Rhymney Iron Company are difficult to move, and do not sufficiently look after their interests; and although it is urgent that the present board of directors should be removed, they have not hitherto given sufficient support to Mr. Hern and those who are connected with him. Several shareholders have now forwarded to me a circular issued by Mr. Hern on behalf of the committee, dated Cardiff, April 5, in which the statement is made that the general committee have decided to deal with the whole question at the annual general meeting, which, it is assumed, the directors will call at an earlier date than usual. This course will spare the shareholders the trouble of completing two sets of proxies or the expense of attending additional meetings. Some small subscription of 10s. 6d. per 100 shares is suggested by the committee in order to defray its expenses, and it appears to me that it is well worth the shareholders' while to support their committee in this manner. The business of the Company is, I believe, one which could be made to pay well under able management. The shareholders have, moreover, been treated particularly badly, as at the meeting held on October 8, 1897, Sir Henry Tyler specially stated that he had warded off a call on the partly-paid shares, and suggested that the first step any new Directors would take would be to make a call; but before the committee had time to go to work, Sir Henry Tyler subsequently took great care to call up the balance of 15s. on all the new shares without even taking the trouble to inform them of the committee's step. It is evident that nothing but a radical change in the personnel of the Board can help the shareholders of the Rhymney Iron Company.

Artificial Rubies.

I am not going to argue now whether artificial rubies are as good as natural stones, but I should like to say a few words with regard to a Company entitled Maiche, Limited, for which subscriptions are at present being invited privately, and which chiefly deals with artificial rubies. The Industrial Inventions Development Company, Limited, of Brook House, 10, Walbrook, London, E.C., is sending out the prospectuses of Maiche, Limited, to shareholders of the Welsbach Incandescent Gas Light Company, with the remark that one of their directors, having been largely interested in the Welsbach Company, has informed them that they (the Welsbach Company) are just returning a considerable amount in cash to their shareholders, who, it was suggested, might wish to invest in this concern. I consider the Welsbach Company a very different enterprise to the one which has been started to exploit an invention for manufacturing rubies, which may or may not prove successful, and I do not consider that the director in question is rendering the Welsbach shareholders any service in thus tempting them to go into a highly speculative undertaking. The prospectus is accompanied by a report by Mr. William Crookes, which is to some extent satisfactory. But when it comes to a question of starting a Company with a capital of £360,000 under the auspices of a Board of Directors who are not well known in this country, it is time to advise caution. I must, of course, also mention that all the other inventions of Mr. Maichie are thrown in as regards this Company, such as dealing with steam, purification of alcohol, sterilisation of water, &c. The chief attraction is, however, evidently the manufacture of rubies, and from my point of view I consider that such an enterprise should not be started until complete commercial success is fully demonstrated to would-be investors.

Old False Teeth Bought.—Many ladies and gentlemen have by them old or disused false teeth, which might as well be turned into money. Messrs. R. D. & J. B. Fraser, of Princes-street, Ipswich (established since 1833), buy old false teeth. If you send your teeth to them they will remit you by return post the utmost value; or, if preferred, they will make you the best offer, and hold the teeth over for your reply. If reference necessary, apply to Messrs. Bacon & Co., Bankers, Ipswich.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

County Club, Cork.—The mistake was to buy Brazilians when they were so high up. After the heavy fall it seems advisable to hold now.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

Menapia.—These German lotteries are bonâ-fide enough, but the money generally sticks to the fingers of the intermediaries, who are of a shady character, and I advise you to have nothing whatever to do with them. Quastor.—Your are quite wrong in your assumption. It depends, of course, upon the articles of association; but generally shareholders in a mining company, for instance, on reconstruction, cannot claim to retain a portion of their interest in such a company, and a proportionate share of the assets. You will find that in such cases the interest can only be retained on the payment of calls, and that if these are not paid, or only partly paid, such interest would be forfeited. Verax.—I really cannot give you the information you require. If you want to interest yourself in Monte Carlo you had better apply direct to the Administration. Ignorant.—1 and 2. If the stocks were bought and sold during the same account, only one brokerage should be charged, viz., that for buying. 3. Yes, there would certainly be the contract stamps. As to whether any other stamps would be charged, that would depend upon whether the stocks are to be taken up, in which case stamp and fees would be charged. Darlington.—Skinner's "Mining Manual" is published by Mr. Walter R. Skinner, of 26, Nicholas-lane, Lombard-street, London, E.C., and is the best book of the kind published. R. B.—I am sorry I cannot recommend you the financial firm in question. As a matter of principle I cannot act as an intermediary. I cannot reply by letter.

Home Rails.

Demos.—What you require has been forwarded in your envelope. E. Z.—Great Central 1894 Ordinary stock will rank with the others on completion of the extension to London. Malta.—Security such as you require you cannot after all obtain in both Great Central 1894 Ordinary (1) and Central London fully-paid Ordinary (2), which are somewhat speculative in a way. In your position you ought to place the money in some securities which return immediate dividends, and you should be able to make a good selection from the lists of home industrial and brewery debentures which I gave in last week's issue. Great Central Ordinary (1894) and Central London fully-paid Ordinary are excellent lock-up of the kind, but they have not the security you look for.

American and Foreign Rails.

W. C. W.—No; I do not consider it wise to sell these Brazilian Railway shares after the heavy fall. Keen.—1. Yes, you should certainly hold your Baltimore and Ohio bonds, as the reorganisation is now being arranged. 2. If you have to sell out it really does not matter which of the two debenture stocks you dispose of, as both are equally promising. Harboro'.—Nos. 1 to 4 are fair American Railroad bonds of the kind. No reason to sell No. 5. D. W. R.—Fair investments of the kind, which, moreover, are cheap now.

Mining Shares.

Spes.—No particular reason for buying these Westralian shares. Lady Shenton or Ivanhoe would be far preferable. Card.—If you are a holder of Nos. 1 to 3 I see no particular reason for selling, but I should not advise you to select these for a purchase now. The same applies to Nos. 4 to 6, amongst which Block B (5) are the most promising. P. K. Z.—I have always held an unfavourable opinion of this West Australian Corporation, and do so still. The same applies to its sub-companies. Greenhead, Glasgow.—1. The London and Globe Finance Corporation paid an interim dividend of 10 per cent. in October last, not 10s. per share, and a further balance dividend for the past year is expected. 2. The Ivanhoe Company is doing well, but additional machinery is being erected, and you must not look for a dividend until this has been in operation for some time. 3. Yes, London and Globes, Lady Shentons, and Randfonteins are amongst the best purchases in the Mining Market. Ireland.—I have repeatedly warned my readers against the Welsh Mining Corporation, and I strongly advise you not to join this reconstruction. It would be simply throwing good money after very bad. Sim.—Rio Tinto Preference shares are now in receipt of 5 per cent. dividends, and should be suitable as an investment. Yarg.—Yes, these are very cheap now, and you might as well average. Glen B.—I do not see how you can get out of the payment of the call on these Quicksilver shares. If you can, do so. A. W. Z., Bury.—No option but to hold these shares for the present, there being no market for them. Alice Isabella.—I should say that London and Globe Finance (2) would be preferable, or you might distribute the investment over Nos. 1 and 2. T. W.—Prospects of the Holcomb Valley seem to be improving, and you had better hold. A. B., Cork.—1. No; I would not advise a purchase of these shares. 2. Doubtful.

Industrial Shares.

W. J. H.—I am sorry I cannot give you the price at which these shares are quoted on the Birmingham Stock Exchange, but you might as well make the exchange you propose. Hermes.—1. I should not buy these Tube shares at present, although you should risk holding now after the heavy fall. 2. An outside concern; deal only through members of the Stock Exchange. 3. After having had so much patience, you had better exercise a little more. F. J. B.—I consider this gunpowder concern as highly speculative, and do not advise the investment. The documents are returned. Care.—The secretary of the Universal Motor Carriage and Cycle Company ought certainly to reply to your questions. 1. You cannot obtain 5 per cent. with perfect safety; please to tell me what class of investments you require. 2. No particular reason for selling Louise & Co. Preference shares at present. T. S.—1. I would not advise a purchase just now of these American Breweries in view of the threatened war. 2. In last week's issue I gave lists of home Industrial Debenture and Preference stocks. Why not make your selection from these? 3. I should advise you to keep your Midland Preferred and Deferred for the present. Blackwood.—I only mentioned the debentures of this industrial concern, as the shares are, of course, speculative. I do not prefer the other stock mentioned. Circle.—The London office is at 20, Threadneedle-street, E.C., and the interest on the debentures is being punctually paid. Pilot.—There seems to be no chance yet of a revival in these cycle shares. F. R.—Yes, J. & J. Yardley & Co. Brewery Five and a Half per Cent. Preference shares are suitable for your small brewery trust, and they are still obtainable at about 5 or a little over. Forrests.—The Davies' Karri Company is doing fairly well, and the shares stand at 1⅝; but the rumours of an amalgamation with the Millars' Company, which was the first-started undertaking of the kind—and one of greater merit—have proved unfounded.

Mixed Investments.

J. W. G.—With regard to your list of proposed investments, you cannot do much better amongst Westralians than to buy Lady Shenton (1) and Florence (2). No. 3 is a fair but speculative investment of the kind, and Nos. 4 and 5 look promising. I cannot reply by letter. F. L. V.—Argentines of 1886 (1) are a good investment, and there is nothing against Nos. 2, 3, and 4. Nos. 5 and 6 are fair speculative investments, and the new Chinese loan (7) is a fair investment, suitable for those who do not mind a little nervousness now and then. T. W. H.—1. A fair investment of the kind. 2. Peruvian Corporation debentures should be held. 3. As you are a shareholder you can obtain a list of the shareholders of the company from the secretary on payment of a small charge. I am afraid that if your account is correct, this hosiery company is most unpromising. H. E. B.—1. The fall in Guatemala was due to the reduction of the duty on coffee to $1, which was a breach of faith on the part of the Government of that Republic, and of which certain people appear to have had early inside knowledge. The matter is evidently doubtful. 2. I have already stated that I do not advise throwing good money after bad in the case of the Sam's Wealth, but if you do not join the reconstruction your shares will be forfeited. Richmond.—1. Yes, a fair investment of the kind. 2. Speculative, but not unpromising. 3. Lady Shenton, Florence, Randfontein, Hannan's Brownhill, Sons of Gwalia, and Rand Mines. 4. Not at present. Tom.—Some of the mining shares mentioned by you are promising, for instance Nos. 1 and 5. The others are not tempting just now, and it would be preferable to put the money into Lady Shenton, Ivanhoe, or London and Globe. I do not think that undertakings like No. 6 will prosper if war breaks out between the United States and Cuba. F. F. F.—1. Yes; whenever the market generally improves. 2. If you do not wish to forfeit your shares there seems to be no option but to join the reconstruction. 3. Yes. 4. Perhaps some day. 5. Yes, the Lady Shenton is doing remarkably well, and a dividend is, no doubt, on the point of being announced. I know nothing of the circumstance mentioned by you, which is, moreover, trifling. 6. Yes. Picton.—1. At 50 the proportion of Union Pacific Preference shares received by the Union Pacific Ordinary shareholders works out to 7·50, so that the price of 20 ex rights would be equal to 27½ with rights. The price of the Prefs. is, however, somewhat higher to-day, viz., 53, so that you can get a little more. 2. Central London Railway shares are a steady market, but the more important improvement in these will doubtless not take place until the opening of the line. This line will in no way affect the Metropolitan district. 3. There might easily be a rise of ½ in these brewery shares. 4 There is no difficulty in buying Lady Shenton shares, and you had better do so at once, as any day may bring a rise. With reference to your subscription to TRUTH, you should apply to Mr. Reginald E. Booker, at the office. C. J L.—The only 'bus companies' shares in which you could invest are those of the London General Omnibus Company and the London Road Car Company, which have no Preference shares I should not advise you to go into tramway shares, as the trouble with the local authorities has not yet been settled. I gave last week lists of Home Industrial Debentures from which you could make a good selection. I cannot advise on the stability of financial firms. E. O. J.—1. Utah Consolidated are likely to take a start very shortly, as all the new shares have been absorbed 2. J. & J. Yardley & Co.'s Brewery Five and a Half per Cent. Prefs. are a good investment at the present price of 5 to 5⅛.

A Chapter on Industrial Stocks.

It is obvious that the war scares must also have their effect upon home industrial securities, and the more active the market has been for stocks in this department, the more severely will the depression doubtless be felt. There have not, however, been wanting a few improvements, and one of a somewhat sensational kind has occurred in Russian Oil shares. The curious feature about this was that rumours were at first put about that the Russian Petroleum Company had been refused the transfer of the property at Baku by the St. Petersburg Government, while it was also rumoured that no dividend was after all to be declared, and that an action was pending with the vendor to rescind the sale. This budget of rumours caused at one time a smart decline, from which, however, a strong recovery took place on the absolute contradiction of the whole story and the declaration of a dividend of £1 per share, and the shares are now up again at 23. Welsbach Incandescent stocks have been a weak market, very little support being extended to quotations, insiders apparently letting matters take their course. The Ordinary are consequently only quoted 107, the Preferred 98, the Deferred 18s. Glasgow has been on the warpath with sales of Coats shares, which have dropped to 58¼, and in Threads (English Sewing Cotton shares) hardly any business is passing, the nominal quotation being ⅝ premium. Lyons & Co.'s shares have improved to 4 5/16, on favourable dividend estimates which are stated at the rate of from 15 to 20 per cent. for the last six months of 1897. Of course, a good deal is made of the acquisition of the premises in Throgmorton-street, and of the rumour that the contract for the refreshment department of the new Crystal Palace Company has been secured. In Brewery shares a moderate business has been transacted, and Allsopp Ordinary are quoted 151, the new Deferred shares being nominally quoted ⅛ premium. J. & J. Yardley & Co.'s Preference shares have been in demand, and have improved to 5 to ⅛. This is not surprising as the shares carry a cumulative dividend of 5½ per cent., and the Brewery is a progressive one. The cycle section has again been comparatively neglected, and dealings are on a very small scale. Amongst Dunlops the Ordinary are quoted 14s. 6d., while the Deferred have further declined to 8s. Humber Ordinary are dull at 12s., ditto Extensions at 7s. Singers have hardened to 11s. 6d., but Cycle Components have eased off to 1¼. Swifts remain at 11s. 3d., while Amalgamated Tyres are again lower at 6s. Efforts have been made to raise the price of Daimler Motor shares, which are now quoted at 10, but I do not see how this advance can in any way be justified. In Lipton shares dealings have quieted down very much, and the price of the Ordinary is ⅞ premium, of the Preferred 3/16 premium, with the Debentures at 5½ premium. With reference to new flotations, it is reported that the old-established firm of Novello, Ewer, & Co. is about to be converted into a limited undertaking, under the style of Novello & Company, Limited. People are asking when Mr. E. T. Hooley's long-talked of Hydraulic Joint Company will appear, and, in the meantime, a rival Company is being talked about. Then, again, Mr. Hooley is stated, by the Birmingham Daily Post, to be preparing the issue of the Lee-Metford Small Arms and Ammunition Company, with a purchase consideration of some £300,000. Sir R. T. Goldsworthy, K.C.M.G., Mr. G. Allen, Captain Chaloner, M.P., Colonel Frederick Hill, Lieutenant-Colonel W. F. Nuttall, the Hon. W. F. B. Massey-Mainwaring, and the Hon. G. F. Parker, are mentioned as the Directors of the undertaking. Further information as regards the value of the inventions acquired must, of course, be awaited. The Directors of Bell's Asbestos Company, Limited, have just announced a dividend at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum for the year ending December 31, 1897. Against former distributions, this is undoubtedly disappointing. National Explosives shares have been steadily dealt in at 1¼ to 1⅜, and, in view of the dividend of 11 per cent. recently paid, this must be considered a moderate price. Hudson's Bay shares have suffered from the war rumours, while the alleged gold discoveries on the Company's properties are contradicted. Under the circumstances, the present price of 20¾ seems quite high enough. Anglo "A" have been weak with the Yankee market, and will probably continue to fluctuate with it, although war news will doubtless be more in demand than ever and should thus provide a considerable source of income. By the way, some of the cables will, in case of war, be in danger of being cut, especially those connecting Cuba either with the States or with other cables serving Spain. West Australian Timber shares continue in fair request and Millars Karri are quoted at 3 5/16. In these shares quite a considerable speculative account has grown up, and at the last settlement the contangoes amounted to from 7 to 8 per cent. I hear that three new W.A. Timber Companies are about to be issued. Bovril Ordinary have been steady at ⅞-1, the Deferred at 9/16-11/16, but dealings have not been active as the Bovril season is drawing to a close. There should now be the turn of Schweppe, but dealings in these are also inactive, the Deferred at ½ to ⅝, Ordinary at 1⅛-¼, and Apollinaris and Johannis have altogether subsided into a very quiet way of business, the quotation being 11¼-11¾. The London Co-Operative Cab Company is still on the warpath with touting circulars inviting subscriptions. I have already expressed my opinion that it is a most risky undertaking, and that the heading of the prospectus, "an absolutely safe investment," is altogether false. Some preference shareholders in Hood & Moore's Stores, Limited, object to the proposal which has been made under which the preference shareholders are asked to give up their right to any surplus dividend that may be earned in future years for positively nothing at all. I am, therefore, somewhat surprised that they did not put forward their views in a more emphatic manner at the adjourned meeting which was held on March 28. The Sun Life Insurance Society's report and accounts for the year ending December 31, 1897, show gratifying progress. 2,329 new life policies, insuring £1,092,382, were issued in that period, during which time the total funds were raised from £3,672,755 to £3,957,198, being an increase of £284,443.—Your affectionate uncle,

MOSES.

P.S.—Tuesday Morning.—The fall of Spanish Fours to 38½ this morning indicates the market opinion that war is inevitable. I have taken this view for some time, and as soon as the resolutions of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives have been brought into agreement, hostilities are expected to break out. The first shock may produce a moderate fall in the markets generally, from which there will doubtless be a rally. Spanish bonds would seem, however, to be bound for lower prices, and so would American rails be, if only temporarily.

QUEER STORY.

THE PEERLESS PALMIST.

"I DISLIKE her," said Roland Keith, "I dislike her, and I distrust her."

"I wish," said his wife, "you would get me some more tea. Who is it you dislike and distrust, dear?"

"Mrs. Lorraine," answered Keith, as he took her cup obediently, "She's—she's—never mind what she is. I wish to Heaven Archie had never seen her. That's all."

Millicent Keith's eyes wandered over the room and its occupants till they rested on a woman's face. A face like a painter's day-dream, fair and pale, and clear as a cameo; beautiful beyond words with the artistic beauty of dead-gold hair, and the marble regularity of chiselled features, and the dreamy glamour of almond-shaped eyes. Ah! those eyes—dark as night and soft as velvet beneath the long sweeping lashes that overshadowed them. To gaze into their lustrous depths was good for no man's peace of mind.

"She has a lovely face," said Millicent, with a little sigh, "and she seems awfully nice and charming and all the rest of it, but if you say she isn't good enough for Captain Lennox, why, of course, she isn't. You must know."

The Keiths had been married for two years, but Millicent still looked up to her husband as the best and wisest being in all the world. Which shows that she was a wonderful woman—or that he was a wonderful man.

Keith looked at her and smiled.

"Good girl," he said, indulgently; "you deserve some more tea."

As he sauntered across the room towards the tea-table everybody looked at him, not only because he was a very well-known and even famous man, and worthy as such to be looked at on every occasion, but also because he had a curious faculty of drawing all eyes to himself, and becoming instantly the central figure of any group that he might join. Yet there was nothing very remarkable about him. A dark clean-shaven face, keen, watchful grey eyes, a quiet reserved manner, a general air of suppressed power—that was all.

The men who had gathered round Mrs. Lorraine's chair gave way at his approach, and made room for him to enter the circle.

"Come and join the discussion, Keith," one of them called out, "We're talking about palmistry."

A slight smile crossed Keith's impassive face,

"Palmistry," he repeated, while his keen eyes wandered from one to another. "Does anybody believe in it?"

"Mrs Lorraine does," answered the man who had spoken before. "At least she says she does."

Again that slight smile flitted over Keith's face.

"Is that the weak spot in your armour of proof, Mrs. Lorraine?" he asked, in his cool, level tones. "I hardly fancied you had one. I thought——" He broke off abruptly.

The woman whom he addressed raised her eyes and flashed him a curious look from beneath her dark lashes. Was it fear, or defiance, or a strange mingling of both?

"What did you think?" she asked.

His eyes hardened as he looked down at her uplifted face, thrown into brilliant relief by the sombre back-ground of the dark plush pillow on which her head rested He hated her as she sat there—hated the indolent grace of her perfectly-poised figure, and the haunting beauty of her cameo-like face, and the nameless charm that attached itself to her lightest word or action and was as much a part of her being as its scent is a part of the rose. With all his heart and soul he hated the woman who had won his best friend's love, and whom he felt instinctively to be unworthy of that love.

He answered her question with another,

"Do you believe in palmistry?" he asked.

Again that curious look flashed into her eyes, but in a moment it was gone, and she was laughing lightly.

"How can I tell you what I believe?" she answered. "Sometimes I believe one thing, and sometimes another. I have no fixed creeds. Am I not a woman?"

The men standing round laughed too, but Keith's eyes grew harder, his face sterner.

"You do believe in it," he said, with quiet insistence, "I am rather good at reading between the lines, and I can read between the lines of that speech. You believe in it—and you are afraid of it."

She hesitated for a moment, looking at him in silence, then made an impatient movement.

"And if I do believe in it," she returned. "If I do believe in it, and if I have had good reason to believe in it—what then?"

"What then?" echoed Archie Lennox, her future husband and Keith's best friend, "What then, Keith? Why shouldn't she believe in it?"

Keith looked quietly from one to the other.

"I am very glad she does believe in it," he said, "I believe in it myself, and I know a good deal about it."

"You!" exclaimed Archie Lennox, and Millicent, who had joined the group, echoed the exclamation in even greater astonishment.

"You don't know all my secrets, Archie," said Keith, with a smile, "Neither do you, Millicent. Perhaps I have more surprises in store for you. Yes, I understand palmistry, and at one time, some years ago now, I took it up quite seriously. I was very successful with it, too, so successful that in certain circles I went by the nickname of the Peerless Palmist."

"By Jove!" said Archie.

Millicent said nothing; but, perhaps, like the oft-quoted parrot, she thought the more.

Keith turned once more to Mrs. Lorraine, and his keen eyes looked straight into hers as he moved nearer to her chair.

"Will you," he asked, "allow me the honour of reading your hand?"

But she shrank away from him, and Millicent, who was watching her more attentively than the others, saw that even her lips were white.

"No," she said, "no; I would rather not. I—I had it read once, and I don't care to have it done again. You can't tell me anything that I don't know."

Keith was still looking at her.

'But I might tell Archie something that he doesn't know," he said.

Archie burst out laughing.

"That's a good joke!" he cried. "I dare say you could tell me something that I don't know, old chap, considering how very little I do know. Come, Hildegarde, give him your hand, and let him tell me all your secrets. You ought to share your secrets with me now, you know, but I never had one to share with anybody, so you won't get much change out of me."

He smiled down at her with adoring eyes, and Keith frowned and drew in his breath sharply. The look on the handsome sunny boyish face expressed such perfect love and trust that it hurt him like a blow. How would it be, he wondered, when that love was dead and that trust broken?

Mrs. Lorraine laid her hand on her lover's arm with a light caressing gesture.

"Don't make me, Archie," she said; "I don't want to."

But Archie, still laughing, took her hand in his and held it out to Keith.

"It's only fun, dear," he said, "Let him show us what he can do. It isn't twice in a lifetime that you get the chance of having your fate foretold by a Peerless Palmist."

He laughed again irrepressibly, but Mrs. Lorraine did not laugh. Millicent could have sworn that she saw her shiver.

Keith took her unwilling hand and held it for a moment, gazing intently at the network of lines that crossed and recrossed the palm, then he dropped it and turned away.

"I never oppose a lady," he said. "It's all right, Archie. The day may come when Mrs. Lorraine will honour me with more confidence than she does now."

"Oh! but it isn't want of confidence, old chap," Archie said eagerly, fearful lest his friend's feelings should be hurt ever so little. "It isn't want of confidence, is it, Hildegarde? It's—it's——"

Keith looked back over his shoulder to interrupt him.

"Take my advice, Archie," he said, imperturbably, "Never try to explain a woman's actions. Life isn't long enough."

Archie turned once more to Mrs. Lorraine.

"Say something to him, Hildegarde," he urged. "Tell him——"

Keith interrupted him again.

"Mrs Lorraine is not going to tell me anything," he said. "Perhaps some day she may tell me something,

The Maximum of Effect at the Minimum of Cost.—An Object Lesson in Decorating and Furnishing can be obtained by inspecting Messrs. Waring's Suites of furnished rooms at 175-181, Oxford-st. W.

and I may tell her something; but not now. Now I am going to write letters. Time and the post wait for no man."

* * * * *

She stood erect and graceful; motionless as if chiselled from marble. Her beauty might have moved the strongest man, yet he who stood facing her was not moved at all. His eyes expressed no admiration as they gazed down into hers; nothing but scorn and bitter hatred.

"You wanted to speak to me," said Hildegarde Lorraine, "and I have come."

Keith smiled.

"Shall I," he asked quietly, "tell you what I read in your hand?"

She smiled too, mockingly, and her eyes flashed defiance into his.

"As you like," she answered with cold disdain. "Tell me by all means if it amuses you."

He looked at her keenly for a moment, then turned away.

"I think," he said, "that on the whole it will amuse me more to tell Archie—and I like to amuse myself."

The smile deepened on her lips and her eyes still flashed defiance,

"Tell him," she cried; "tell him all you know—all you read. There is nothing that I should mind his knowing. There is nothing"——

Keith turned and looked at her. For a moment she returned his gaze in full, then the mocking smile died suddenly on her lips, and the light faded from her eyes. She sank down into a chair, and covered her face with her hands.

"Why do you defy me?" Keith asked quietly. "It is only waste of time, and time is too short to waste."

She raised her head and looked at him, and the misery and despair in her uplifted eyes might have touched a heart of stone.

"Why do you hate me?" she cried passionately. "Why do you hate me and persecute me? What have I done to you?"

"You have tricked and fooled my best friend," Keith answered sternly, and the words cut like a knife; "tricked and fooled him into loving you. Are you worthy of his love?"

She winced and shrank back as if he had struck her.

"I will be so," she cried desperately; "I will make myself so. I—I have never had a chance before, never one chance in all my life, but now—now——"

"Oh! spare me that old tale," he interrupted, with a bitter sneer. "I thought you were too clever a woman to bring forward such a threadbare excuse. Women have too many chances—far too many, in my humble opinion."

She looked at him again, then down at her fan, turning it over and over in her hands.

"You must," she said slowly, "be a very bad man. Only bad men are hard on women."

For a moment there was silence; then Keith laughed grimly.

"What I may be doesn't matter," he said; "the only thing that matters is what you are, and that wouldn't matter if you hadn't deceived my friend."

"Archie loves me," she said very softly, "and I—love him."

Keith laughed again with uplifted eyebrows.

"Love!" he echoed scornfully. "Women like you don't know what love means."

A sudden light flashed into her eyes—a wonderful light of passion and yearning and tenderness unspeakable.

"Don't they?" she returned quietly. "Well, of course you must know. You are a man, and men know everything."

Keith frowned. His self-confidence was practically boundless, yet he could not repress an uneasy feeling that it was possible—just possible—that this woman might prove his match if she were fairly put to it on a fair field. She was a foe of no ordinary calibre.

"We are only wasting time now," he said, "and any moment we might be interrupted. Don't you think we had better end this—er—unpleasant interview?"

"Certainly," Mrs. Lorraine answered in the same quiet tone. And then she raised her eyes and looked at him over the edge of her fan—the look of a trained fencer before he crosses swords with his adversary.

"I am going to place two alternatives before you," Keith went on, "and to give you your choice of two courses of action; which is, I think, generous on my part."

"Men are always generous," said Mrs. Lorraine.

"Your engagement," Keith went on, "must be broken off—that is the point from which we start—and it is for you to choose in what way it shall be broken off. If you like to take the affair into your own hands and carry it through in your own way, well and good. I will leave it to you, provided you do your work thoroughly."

Her eyes were still fixed on his face.

"And if," she said, "I decline to take the affair into my own hands; if I decline to move in the matter?"

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Oh! then," he said—"then I must speak to Archie myself."

Silence again, a strained, tense, breathless silence that neither cared to break. Mrs. Lorraine was the first to speak.

"I will," she said slowly, "take the affair into my own hands."

Keith started and drew a long, deep breath, as if he had passed safely through a dangerous crisis to relief unspeakable.

"I will," she said again, "take the affair into my own hands, and I will do my work thoroughly. You may trust me. If I did not love Archie I would defy you to the bitter end, and let you tell him the truth; but I do love him. And so—and so I want to keep the truth from him. I want—I want——"

At that moment Archie's voice came to them faintly through the curtains that divided the drawing-room from the room in which they were.

"Hildegarde, Hildegarde, where are you?"

Mrs. Lorraine started, and the words that she had been about to speak died on her lips. For a moment she stood as if turned to stone. Then she moved slowly forward to meet her lover.

* * * * *

"I suppose it was all your doing," said Millicent Keith; "I suppose you found out something against Mrs. Lorraine and used your knowledge to force her to give up Captain Lennox. You are a very clever man, Roland."

She looked admiringly at her husband, but he only sighed as he ran his fingers through his crisp dark hair.

"Poor old Archie!" was all he said.

Millicent sighed too.

"Yes, poor old Archie," she said, "He's fearfully cut up, isn't he? I don't think he will ever get over it. He was so fond of Mrs. Lorraine, and—and oh! Roland, are you sure it would not have been better to let him marry her? He might never have known the truth, and when people love like that——"

Keith made an impatient movement.

"Quite sure," he answered briefly.

Millicent was silent for a moment, pondering many things. There was a good deal in the affair that she did not understand.

"Why did you push Mrs. Lorraine forward?" she asked presently. "Why did you make her break off the engagement? Why didn't you speak to Captain Lennox yourself, and tell him the truth?"

Keith hesitated for a moment, looking curiously down at the puzzled face uplifted to his; then suddenly he burst out laughing.

"For the best of all reasons," he answered coolly; "I don't know the truth."

Millicent fell back a step, gazing at him in blank, bewildered amazement.

"You don't know the truth?" she repeated helplessly; "you don't know the truth? Then how—why——"

"I made Mrs. Lorraine believe that I knew it," Keith said grimly, "and that did just as well as if I had known it. I threatened her that I would tell the truth to Archie, and to save that she took the matter into her own hands, and told him a lie. I thought she would. I know a little about women."

Millicent looked as she felt, more bewildered than ever.

"But—but—but her hand," she stammered. "You looked at her hand, and—and they called you the Peerless Palmist, you said."

He laughed again.

"Oh! as to that," he said, "that was a polite fiction on my part. I know nothing about palmistry, and I don't believe in it. But I found that Mrs. Lorraine did believe in it. Every nature, however strong, has its vulnerable point, and superstition is hers. She is a very clever woman, but she has that one small weakness, and I took advantage of it. She has a secret to guard—I suspected that from the first—but what it actually is I know no more than you do, though I made her believe that I knew everything. Do you see?"

Millicent fairly gasped.

"Oh!" she said, as soon as she could speak. "Then do you really mean that you know nothing about Mrs. Lorraine—absolutely nothing?"

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Absolutely nothing," he repeated with emphasis—"absolutely nothing. I played a game of bluff, and played it rather well. That is all."

ART NOTES.

THE NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB.

THIS is the twentieth exhibition of the Club. It would be too much, perhaps, to say that its members have sown all their artistic wild oats. But it is evident that the increasing tale of years of their Club's existence has brought with it an increasing sense of responsibility on the part of the exhibitors. Their Club is now out of its teens, and many signs of its approach to years of discretion may be seen upon the walls of the Dudley Gallery. The present exhibition is, in fact, one of much interest, and it is marred by few of those lapses into purposeless eccentricity and defiant mannerism which the visitor had learned to expect at the shows of this New English Art Club. Mr. Walter Sickert is a hardened offender in these respects, and he exhibits a portrait of Miss Hilda Spong as Imogen Parrot, in Mr. Pinero's "Trelawny of the 'Wells,'" which proves a very disturbing element on the wall where it is hung. The executive skill shown in painting this picture only aggravates the perverseness of the artist in choosing thus to place on record all that was most ugly and tasteless in the fashions of the early sixties. It is bad enough to catch even a fitful glance, at the Court Theatre, of the hideous enormities of dress of which we were then guilty. To have them perpetuated in a life-sized portrait, hung at a public picture exhibition, is nothing less than insufferable. Mr. P. Wilson Steer is another of the New-English-Art brotherhood, who seems determined to startle and surprise rather than to satisfy. He has been not inaptly termed "a Proteus of the brush." But, unfortunately, in his eagerness to shine as a Jack of many styles, he has made himself a master of none. It was an ill-advised act on the part of the Hanging Committee to accord the place of honour to the study of the female nude figure to which he has given the name "Sleep." True, the picture is painted with considerable force, and the colour scheme is not without clever, showy effects which one can admire. But what is to be said of the brown-skinned model, clad, or rather unclad, in a crimson-lined cloak, and lying on a buff-coloured sofa, save that she is unnecessarily nude and impossibly wooden? The pose is unspeakably awkward and constrained, especially for a woman who is supposed to be asleep, and as to her limbs, you could positively knock nails into them. Mr. Steer is seen to better advantage in his "Vista," an avenue of trees through the branches of which the effect of shimmering sunlight is shown with considerable ingenuity.

It is so seldom possible to speak with unreserved praise of what one sees at modern picture exhibitions, that I highly appreciate the chance offered me of doing so by Mr. C. H. Shannon. It had been my privilege to see his "Man with the Yellow Glove" before, at the gallery of Mr. Van Wesselingh, I think it was. It was this admirable portrait which gained for its artist a gold medal at the Munich International Exhibition last year; and it is certainly the best to be seen just now at the Dudley Gallery. Mr. C. W. Furse with his finely idealized "Portrait of a Lady," must be content to take a second place. The work of Mr. W. Strang seems oddly out of place in the Exhibition of a Club promoted to force the note of ultra modernity in Art. With his "Pieta" and "Diana," he takes us back several centuries, and suggests "Old Flemish" rather than "New English" Art. The "Vezelay Cathedral" of Mr. Will Rothenstein comes as a surprise. There is a true dignity and impressiveness in this picture which are all the more welcome, when one recalls the fact that Mr. Rothenstein has been sometimes content to secure attention for his work by other and more questionable displays of his undoubted talents.

Amongst many pictures that deserve attention, mention may be made of Mr. D. S. MacColl's "Hampton Court," an unexpectedly lucid drawing; Mr. Bernhard Sickert's "Pilchard Boats, St. Ives"; Mr. C. H. Shannon's masterly "Wounded Amazon"; Mr. Moffat Linder's "White Cloud, Dordrecht," and his delightfully Whistlerian nocturne, "After Sundown, St. Ives"; Mr. Graham Robertson's strikingly clever portrait of Mr. Arthur Melville; Mr. Wilson Steer's "Chinchilla"; Mr. Bertram Priestman's "Hot Day"; Mr. David Muirhead's "Elsie," and Mr. J. L. Henry's "Last of the Harvest." The sketch of an "Ironer," sent by Mons. E. Degas can hardly satisfy his most ardent admirers. The sooty-complexioned figure he has painted is not as nearly as suggestive of a laundress and clear starcher as of a sweep.

MUSIC.

LANSDOWNE COTTELL AND THE WORKING MAN.

THE following letter concerning Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, his "London Conservatoire of Music," and his alleged "free" scholarships, speaks for itself. The case seems a very heartless one, even harder, perhaps, than most of those which have been brought before the notice of the public in TRUTH in regard to this precious speculation during the past eighteen months. It is perfectly obvious that in the present instance the intended victim is little more than a working man, and that if he had fallen into the trap of "free" scholarships, he might have lost his hard earned wages. Even now he is out of his billet on the faith of Cottell's specious advertisements. This "free" scholarship business is, indeed, absolutely a myth. For many months past the conduct of the London Conservatoire and the proceedings of Mr. Lansdowne Cottell have been constantly before TRUTH, and I am bound to say that I have never in the course of my investigations come upon a single bonâ fide free scholar. In every case payment is required; a fact which ought to appeal strongly to newspapers which admit Cottell's advertisements, and particularly to a respectable and representative journal like the Stage, which has done splendid work in exposing theatrical abuses, and certainly is in no pecuniary need of the slender advertisement revenue obtained from such a source as Cottell. Here is the letter, which I give in my correspondent's own rugged language:—

47, Galbraith-street, Poplar, London, E.
Wednesday, April 6, 1898.

DEAR SIR,—I am afraid I may be encroaching on your valuable time, but I feel in duty bound to thank TRUTH for unearthing that trap laid (for simpletons such as I) by Mr. Lansdowne Cottell.

I'll unfold my story as briefly as I can. I possess an extra good tenor voice. Spent money on it in Glasgow. Anxious to get to London, but unable to get for want of means. Got situation in Southampton, expenses paid, &c. Remained in it three months, when I noticed Cottell's advertisement (offering "free scholarships") in the paper named The Stage. I wrote him (or, perhaps, I should say the "secretary," although I have never managed to discover his name on any of the circulars, &c.), and a syllabus and a "free scholarship" form were sent me. I filled in form; went on appointed day and sung. Gained "free scholarship" right away, to commence first lesson on following night, Thursday, March 24. The day appointed to hear me was Wednesday the 23rd, as you will see by looking on front page of "free" form; still that does not prevent him from dating the "form" wrongly, viz., 21st (in red ink). He told me the "year" consisted of four terms of ten weeks each, and I would require to pay the sum of one guinea and the remainder of the two years would be free. He did not say anything about also paying a guinea in advance for library (and half yearly too, eh!) I only learned this to-day, when I read the rules which were sent me to-day along with the enclosed letter urging me to come on Thursday to commence lessons, and to bring the rules signed, &c.

I was naturally pleased to have gained a "free scholarship," knowing I would never be able to be thoroughly trained otherwise. I told him so, and that I hoped to be a credit to him, &c. I told him how I came to Southampton, and for what purpose; that I had mother, brother, and sisters younger than I, all depending on me, and that all the money I had in the world was my weekly wage. I told him I'd require to remove from Southampton to London and first of all find employment before commencing lessons (said lessons to take place in the evening, after business hours). He told me to make haste and commence on the following night, but I refused until I got properly removed and employment found. I did remove, and in my search for employment came across a musical gentleman who doesn't know Cottell, but referred me to a back number of TRUTH. (And I see TRUTH does know him.) I got TRUTH, July 1, 1897, and I've read enough to convince me that I have just escaped a leech. I also notice a paragraph in last week's TRUTH re Cottell. I received the enclosed rules and letter to-day (Wednesday). I have been foolishly done out of employment, but perhaps I'll yet "see day aboot wi' him" (as they say in Scotland).

I write this merely to show my sense of gratitude to TRUTH for saving me immense trouble, and for exposing such an impostor.—Yours truly, JAMES McLEAN.

P.S.—Please return letters, &c.

Cottell's documents are in the usual form. First came the printed circular as to "Resident and free scholarships," with its glorified and ridiculous picture of the "Conservatoire," in which — the handwriting is similar to that upon letters signed "L. Cottell"—the "Director" states that he will hear candidates on Wednesday 23rd from 4 to 7, candidates being required to bring music they can perform. A form was likewise enclosed which the candidate "must fill up previous to interview," and, curiously enough, this form is marked "free scholarship" and "Not transferable," although it seems the receiver of the circular may fill in the name. There is a note on the form that "all candidates entering this department receive instruction free of fees for two years." This, of course, is simply bosh. Free instruction, so far as I have ever discovered, is wholly unknown at the London Conservatoire of Music, and in the present instance Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, in his own writing and in blood-red ink has added the significant notification, "One term 21s. Free after. March 27, 1898. Director, Lansdowne Cottell." This done, there came a further letter enclosing the "Rules," the letter being as follows:—

London Conservatoire of Music,
Hyde Park, W., April 5, 1898.

Mr. J. Lean.

DEAR SIR,—I have passed you for "free" vocal tuition. You must sign the enclosed rules and pay 21s. for library fee. You can receive first lesson Thursday 12 to 9, or Wednesday 4 to 9 p.m. You might, if you attend then, bring the rules signed, &c.—Yours truly, L. COTTELL.

Mr. McLean, canny Scot that he is, refused to pay this further guinea. But, unfortunately, he had given up his work at Southampton on the faith that tuition at the "London Conservatoire" was "free," and accordingly he finds himself out of employment. Small wonder that, as a British working man, he wants to "see day aboot wi" Mr. Cottell. That day, if I know the Scottish working man aright, will, when it comes, be found by Mr. Cottell a remarkably warm one.

Last year I devoted a good deal of space to this subject, and as business seems again to be pushing with Mr. Lansdowne Cottell and his "London Conservatoire of Music," it may, perhaps, be as well to say a few further words about it. The game is now not played so much in London as in the provinces, and particularly at Manchester, Birmingham, York, and Leeds. It would seem strange that men so keen in business matters as Lancastrians and Yorkshiremen should swallow the bait so obviously dangled before them. But the "free" scholarship dodge seems to take, although it must be perfectly obvious after the first interview or, at any rate, after the first letter received from Mr. Cottell, that the word "free" is an abuse of terms, and that payment of some sort is in all cases insisted upon. So far as the pupils are concerned, some of the young people from the country may perhaps consider their "resident" scholarship at the London Conservatoire of Music as a species of trip to London at the cost of their friends; and we all know what that means to the average country girl. But I repeat that, so far as I have ever been able to discover, there are no "free" resident scholarships. Everybody has to pay, and, indeed, in one of the circulars dated March 14, 1898, now before me, there is, in Mr. Cottell's handwriting, under the heading "Free Scholarships," a note "Resident scholarship reduces the year's fee to sixty guineas."

It would seem that, although readers of TRUTH are perfectly familiar with Mr. Cottell's little ways, yet he still can find clients either among the non-resident aspirants for "free" scholarships in London or among "residents" from the provinces. Those who desire to read the whole history of "the London Conservatoire of Music" and the development of its director's name from George Cottle, who in 1853 was a student, until it blossomed forth into "Lansdowne Cottell," may be referred to TRUTH of November 12, 1896, where the whole thing was set out at length. The real facts concerning his "free" scholarships were then disclosed, and also the manner in which the revenues of the "Conservatoire" were enhanced by the premiums paid by "private secretaries" and residential "free" scholars. It is not a pretty story, and the fact that the game continues does not, I fear, say much for the common sense of the British public.

To the delight of everybody, except, I suppose, the inveterate musical "deadhead," the concert season this year promises to be much lighter than usual, so that we shall probably not have many more than twenty-five or thirty concerts a week in May. The summers of 1896 and 1897 proved a severe pill to some of our foreign visitors who believed that London at midsummer was a species of Tom Tiddler's ground, but who found that amidst the press of social, political, and business life they were overlooked, unless, indeed, they were able to command an audience by their rank or artistic celebrity. It is hard lines on the pianist, when, after going to the trouble of getting up a recital, he receives no notice from the more important papers, and is presented by his agent with a bill for £40 or £50 deficit. A year or two ago the confiding foreign piano maker used to pay the bill. But now he has become more sensible.

Last year the Jubilee knocked all sorts of recital and other minor concert-giving on the head for a good month in the height of the fashionable season. This year, accordingly, most of the eminent Continental perfomers are wisely giving England a wide berth in the summer. M. Paderewski has already announced his decision not to try any recitals this season. Herr Rosenthal has followed suit, and last Saturday was his final recital until the autumn. M. Gabrilowitsch has left for his native land, and will not be back until the new year, while the majority of other great instrumentalists now find it more profitable to visit us in the autumn or early spring than in June.

Indeed, according to the official lists issued from Queen's and St. James's Halls, there are at present, from mid-May to the end of June, only three afternoon concerts booked at the larger Queen's Hall, and only six evening concerts booked at St. James's Hall during a period of little over six weeks. This almost constitutes a "record," and although no doubt before May is well forward some of the vacant dates may be filled up, yet it is obvious that the fashionable season will, from a concert point of view, be much slacker than usual. The principal fixtures are the Philharmonic concerts, three of which are already over, two concerts for Herr Mottl, one for Herr Weingärtner, four for Dr. Richter, two for M. Lamoureux, and recitals for Messrs. Friedheim, Ross and Moore, De Pachmann, Otto Hegner, and Bispham, Mesdames Pancera, Janotha, Zeisler, and others. Mme. Patti, who is now holiday making at Craig-y-Nos, will also be here early in June to sing at the Ganz Jubilee concert, besides at a concert at the Crystal Palace and at two concerts to be given at the Albert Hall by Messrs. Harrison.

Herr Felix Mottl has been chosen as conductor of the three cycles of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" at Covent Garden in June. Indeed, when Mr. Maurice Grau failed to come to an arrangement with Dr. Richter, it was perfectly obvious that Mottl was the next best man. Accordingly, it is extremely fortunate that (mainly thanks to the intervention of Mr. Alfred Schulz-Curtius) Herr Mottl has been secured for that which promises to be the most important series of Wagnerian representations ever given in this country. In regard to the other German performances, another conductor must be chosen. It may possibly be Mahler, who seems to have been making things "hum" in Vienna, but who wishes to pay another visit to London. At any rate, we must have a German conductor for Wagner. The Italians seems to labour under the impression that Wagner necessarily implies noise.

By the way, Tolstoi has run amuck against the Wagnerites, who no doubt will be ready enough to oblige him by treading upon the tail of his coat. Tolstoi saw "Siegfried" but remained unconvinced. He was told, he says, that Wagner's works could only be appreciated amid the darkness, the concealed orchestra, and other eccentricities of Bayreuth, which puny managers here affect to imitate. He, therefore, attributes the Wagner craze to a species of musical hypnotism. Spiritualists, he says, hold the same argument, for they aver that you are not able to give an opinion if you have not been present at séances and manifestations. "In other words," Tolstoi says, "you must pass some few hours in the company of people half mad, and repeat the experiment a dozen times, and you will see what they see. In such conditions as these one sees what one likes. But there is a much simpler method of arriving at the same results. You have only to drink alcohol or smoke opium."

Sir Arthur Sullivan is, I understand, expected in London this week from the Riviera. His new opera, "The Beauty Stone," which may or may not be seen at the Savoy one month from next Saturday, is not quite finished, as there is still some work to do on the last act, although the first act is already in rehearsal. Many will regret to learn that neither Miss Florence Perry nor Mr. Kenningham is a member of the cast, which, as I have already stated, will include two new Americans, namely, Mr. Devoll and Mr. Isham, the baritone. Miss Pauline Joran, who likewise joins the company from the Carl Rosa troupe, has been referred to as an American, although she was really born in Australia. She, however, as a juvenile prodigy, made her debut with two of her sisters in San Francisco in 1885, and when she joined the Carl Rosa Company five years ago to play Beppo in "L'Ami Fritz" (in which, it may be recollected, she not only sang but played the violin) she was announced as an American soprano. Miss Pauline Joran, some years since appeared at a Liverpool concert in the double rôle of violinist and vocalist, singing certain operatic songs, and likewise giving a very good performance of Mendelssohn's violin Concerto. Her younger sister Elise is a pianist and a pupil of Mr. Eugène d'Albert.

The rest of Mr. D'Oyly Carte's company for the new Pinero-Sullivan opera are better known to Savoy audiences. Miss Brandram will, I learn, have a good part in the new piece, while Mr. Lytton is a rejuvenated Faust, and Mr. Walter Passmore will again be principal comedian. Miss Emmie Owen, dancer and vocalist, will likewise have a strong rôle, that of an old woman made young by the Beauty Stone, while among the members of the company in the new cast will be Miss Ruth Vincent, Mr. Jones, Mr. Hewson, and one or two others.

There was again a small audience at the Crystal Palace on Saturday, and indeed the programne was not strong enough to attract people from the big football match in the grounds. As was anticipated, these spring concerts have not been very largely attended. This, however, was foreseen, and it is hoped that the result will be attributed to the correct cause, and not to any neglect of Sydenham on the part of the music-loving public. It has many times been demonstrated that when the great orchestral concerts are in full swing in London the Saturday Symphony Concerts are not needed at the Crystal Palace. On the other hand, the concerts before Christmas drew large houses. The chief item of interest last Saturday was the revival of one of Bach's violin concertos, this time according to the version prepared by M. Gevaert, the well-known composer of Brussels.

Herr Rosenthal fairly astonished the audience at his final recital at St. James's Hall on Saturday by one of the finest performances which has been heard for many years of Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," and a still more brilliant rendering of Liszt's enormously difficult fantasia on themes from Mozart's "Don Giovanni." That Rosenthal is something more than a mere virtuoso was, however, abundantly proved by an extremely classical and reverent reading of Beethoven's great sonata, Op. 109. In short, the German pianist demonstrated his surpassing ability in both schools—a rare combination of the talents, which this season seem to have made even M. Paderewski sit up. Rosenthal will, I believe, be back here in the autumn, before he sails for the United States.

The operatic rehearsals start at Covent Garden on Monday under Signor Mancinelli and M. Flon. Mr. Maurice Grau has recognised the justice of the criticisms passed of recent years upon the stage management and has appointed Herr Pohlig, of Bayreuth, for the German operas and M. Baudu for the ordinary repertory. One mistake I hope will not be repeated, namely, the turning out of the lights in the auditorium, except, of course, for the advanced Wagner operas, in which managers dearly like to play at Bayreuth. The fact must not be forgotten that ladies, who are the chief supporters of the opera, go not only to see but to be seen. There is no use in buying new frocks and wearing jewels if they have to sit in the dark. When once the ladies desert the opera, good-bye to the Syndicate. The opera should be a blaze of colour and luxury and brightness. It is a place of amusement and not a tomb.

Mortlock's (Oxford-st.), Estd. A.D. 1746.—The collection of China and Glass now on view in their Galleries fully maintains the high reputation and pre-eminence enjoyed by "Mortlock's" for the last century and a half, and well repays a visit of inspection.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

My dear Mr. Wyndham,—I fear that after you have read Mr. Frederick Hovenden's "What is Life" (1) you will still hold with Mrs. Barbauld and all the rest of the world :—

> Life, I know not what thou art,
> But know that thou and I must part ;
> But when, or where, or how we met
> I own to me's a secret yet.

To me at least it seems that Mr. Hovenden incurs the rebuke of Job of "multiplying words without knowledge." You are prejudiced to begin with by the kind of cheap jack patter of his elaborate proof of what no one, not the smallest child, doubts—that time is as much a human invention as the clock which measures it. Nor, again, is his demonstration that space must be infinite, because we cannot conceive an abrupt limit to it, as triumphant as he appears to think it, since neither can we conceive infinity. As a matter of fact, the mind can conceive neither an antecedent eternity nor an infinity of space. However, the book is suggestive and interesting if only for the numberless and judicious scientific quotations contained in its notes. If you should need refreshment after your profound plunge into Mr. Hovenden's biological revelation, I strongly recommend you to take up and skim through Mr. Robert Hichens' roaring farce, "The Londoners" (2). You will resent occasionally his tumbling head over heels to catch "the loud laugh which speaks the vacant mind," and resent it all the more since it so often breaks in upon most excellent fooling; but you have only to skip the Bun Emperor, Bush and Harrison scenes, and confine yourself to those in which the masquerading American divorcee plays a part. In a word, the first half of the book is like the before-supper dancing at a tenants' ball, "merry within the limit of becoming mirth," and the last part, like the drunken after-supper romp, is forced, farcical, and occasionally foolish. While the silliness of English society is satirised in "The Londoners," its vulgarity is unconsciously exposed in "American Wives and English Husbands (3). It is a very clever novel indeed, illustrative of the difference between the ideas and ideals of the two countries. At the same time, it is hardly fair to contrast Yankee sordid absorption in the deteriorating pursuit of money with aristocratic British superiority to money-grubbing, when the plot turns upon Englishmen bartering their titles for the fortunes of American heiresses. However, the author is poetically just in blessing only the love-match between an American wife and an English husband, and cursing with ruin, disgrace, and suicide the mercenary marriage. Surely, to sell your soul for money in a country where wealth is the sole distinction is less sordid than to sell it, as Lord Barnstable sold it, to regild his coronet? The degrading effect of this money-worship is shown by the author, sometimes consciously, sometimes unconsciously, in the painful vulgarity of almost all her grand personages. I am greatly disappointed in Mr. St. John Adcock's "The Consecration of Hetty Fleet," which is far, indeed, from fulfilling the fine promise of his first book, "East End Idylls." The plot of "The Consecration of Hetty Fleet" (4) is a morbid conception, and the characters, which have, so to say, been poured into its mould, take unwholesome shape and shade from it. An illegitimate son kills his own father through jealousy of his sweetheart's intimacy with the older man; and the mother of the boy —the former mistress of the man—commits suicide in order that the murder may be laid at her door! This monstrous sacrifice is not made more natural or less revolting through being attributed to divine inspiration.

> Her duty had been made clear to her; without conscious volition she had grasped the great scheme of final retribution to the minutest detail, and with a grateful obedience readily submitted herself to its fulfilment. To her it was no sacrifice, no outcome of blind devotion to any human idol; she accepted the promptings of her own exceeding love as inspired revelations of the will of a righteously offended Deity.

Tragedy, or, rather, melodrama, of this sort is a cheap, crude way of bringing down the gallery, to which a writer of Mrs. R. Douglas King's lightness and deftness of touch need not have had resort. Yet some of the stories in her charming collection, "The Child Who Will Never Grow Old" (5), are too tragic and even too terrible for her pretty theme. The diary wherein the "Little Black Sheep" relieves his tortured soul of his long-pent-up rage and wretchedness reads like a transcript from a real document of the "Pet Marjory" kind. The tragic consequences to the Little Black Sheep of this frenzied outburst against his pious and fiendish aunt are narrated with thrilling power and pathos.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, very sincerely yours, DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—"O to be in England, Now that April's there!" wrote Browning, and the odd thing is that the English all scramble out of it, if they can only manage to do so. Even in town it is a lovely month. It seems as if every one of the joys of summer are folded in with the tight little burgeons of the opening leaves, and that we can have a foretaste of them if we will only pay attention. First, we have April itself, with its exquisite greenness bursting forth from its brownness, and its dappled sky. Then we look mentally on into May, and behold the miracle of green spread forth on all the blackened stems of the patient trees, and the flowers that come in May and paint the earth with colour. Then June advances, radiant in our visionary forecast of her, the loveliest month in all the year. After June the freshness dies away. It is my darling month, and should be enjoyed in every hour of every day, as they too quickly pass us by. A rainy June is like a robbery, of so many dear delights does it cheat us.

I am so thankful that the Whitsuntide holidays come in June this year. We shall be able to get away from town for at least ten days to enjoy our pet month in her own home, down in the country, in the English lanes and hedges, in the woods and copses, and by the running brooks. You who live always in the country cannot imagine, even by trying hard, how we Londoners are thirsty for simple rural life. The very quiet of it is a medicine for our weary minds after the incessant listening that we involuntarily practise in this never-silent London. And the restful green of the trees and fields is solace for our jaded eyes. Blessed be the country! With our appreciation of its pleasures, it would be foolish to live in it. We might wreck our appetite for its sights and sounds by having them every day—which would be silly indeed.

We walked across Regent's Park last Wednesday, and were delighted with it. The great avenue of chestnuts is just sending out its millions of brown-green baby leaves, the mother calyx still tightly holding their tiny skirts as if unwilling to trust them to a biting world. The flower-beds are full of fragrant hyacinths in every colour, and at one especial little wild part there are bluebells, scilla, and daffodils growing up out of the grass just as they do in the heart of the woods. The whole of this part of the park is given over to the poor, and it is good that it should be so. Their enjoyment of it is in proportion to their lack of home comforts. Think of the sensations of a hard-worked mother of a family, after a week's washing, and cooking, and sewing in a tiny room, when she sits or walks under the trees, drinking in the pure air and enjoying her youngsters' joy in addition to her own, an agreeable kind of compound interest, far beyond the calculations of any ready reckoner.

We rambled round to the western side, where a strip of turf and a wide gravelled walk by the water were thrown open to the public a year or two since. Here happiness was queen of the day. Here the babies and others of tender age were enjoying themselves, with a concentration upon the moment of which we grown-ups are incapable. Their homes in dingy courts and back streets, in attics and cellars were forgotten, or only so far remembered as to heighten the joy of the hour by force of contrast. To get on the grass was their first desire, as they arrived in battalions upon the scene. "On 'e drass!" shouted a baby voice, and its proprietor immediately flung herself face downwards upon the low rail, and lifted one foot over as she lay, almost putting it into the mouth of her companion, another tiny tot, who was "climbing" the barrier behind her in similar undignified, but practical, fashion. Amidst all the happiness there was one little girl bathed in tears. This interfered with our Epicurean pleasure in the scene, and we asked what was the matter, with a view to stopping the tears if we could; but it was beyond our power. The child herself was too much overcome to speak, but her brother answered for her: "She's cryin' 'cos it's time to go 'ome." Small wonder!

A curious thing then happened. A small boy, who had heard our question and the reply, advanced into the centre of the path opposite where we were sitting, and favoured us with a flood of fiction about the little girl. Standing in the attitude of one who recites, he provided the absent child with a whole string of relatives, including a nurse and a baby sister, an angry mother and a most forbidding old grandmother, who kept a stick "up the back of her collar." He rattled all this out to us with the ease of a trained novelist, giving the minutest details of what there was to be for tea when the girl got home, and the furniture of the room she was to have the meal in. We listened in perfect silence. When he was tired, he returned to his post by the water. I wish we had asked his name. He is pretty sure to develop into a successful novelist or perhaps a statesman, part of whose business it is to have any number of statements ready for use at a moment's notice.

We noticed, by the way, that the prudent waterfowl had unanimously retreated to the island, from which safe distance they watched the crowd. Wise birds!

"A suburban tour" is the latest idea for theatrical companies. This will give you some idea of the great number of outlying theatres. "How London Lives" is going on a suburban tour, for the old Princess's is to be taken down and practically rebuilt. There are many memories clinging to the place. And fancy, dear, the old Prince of Wales's in Tottenham-street is also a thing of the past—the theatre where the Bancrofts worked such a revolution for the stage. Lady Bancroft, by the way, has been seriously ill at her house in Berkeley-square. We are hoping she will be better in time for her promised performance on Thursday, May 19, when she is to act in a play, written by herself, at the Comedy, in aid of the funds of the Royal School of Art Needlework.

We were fortunate enough to visit the Lyceum on the same evening as Dr. and Mrs. Nansen, and had a good opportunity of studying them both. The Doctor looked paler and thinner than when we heard him lecture a year ago, and we set this down to his longing for another arctic trip. These men who make geography are, like astronomers, never quite happy when not engaged in discovering something. Mrs. Nansen has a nice, girlish face, with a certain shrewdness in it. Rather serious she seemed, but that may have come from intentness upon a play in another language than her own. She wore a neat white silk blouse, and had her brown hair simply arranged and yet becomingly. We remembered, as we looked at her, that when every one began to despair of her husband's safety, she was firm in her conviction of his return. Of such stuff should heroes' wives be ever made.

We went on Friday afternoon to hear Maestro Boldi and his orchestra play at the Savoy Hotel. He is a Hungarian violinist who has quite lately played before the Queen at Cimiez. The musicians were embowered in flowers and evergreens, and their music was romantic enough to warrant this poetic environment. The amount of light and shade they got into the "Millenium" valse and a lovely thing called "Kisleany," by Nemethy, was marvellous. This is the perfect way to enjoy music—comfortably buried in luxurious chairs in a beautiful room like the White Salon, with its palms and flowers, instead of being planted out in rows like young turnips, after the fashion of the ordinary concert room.

Princess Christian is to distribute the medals and certificates won by competitors in connection with the National Health Society on Saturday afternoon, June 11, at Grosvenor House.

On Saturday last the members, associates, and graduates of the Children's Salon were at home at the Westminster Town Hall, and for the amusement and entertainment of their guests displayed those accomplishments in which they are encouraged to excel by the competitions for prizes. Some danced, others sang, or played on the piano and violin, some recited, and the needlework and drawings of numbers of the Salon young people were exhibited. By the way, there were some remarkably clever designs for posters. The gem of the occasion, however, was the reciting of a little girl of about six, whose excellent elocution, appropriate gesture, and suitable expression were wonderful in one so young. The manner in which she made her voice audible through the great hall, without raising it, was quite remarkable. The prizes were very pretty, consisting of necklaces of Orient pearls, feather fans, swallow brooches, silver-topped scent-bottles and silver-backed brushes, whilst some winners were made happy with pretty editions of Shakespeare and Tennyson in cases, and even those who won nothing had plenty of compensation in the merry, happy afternoon.

You cannot possibly deny yourself a new hat, though your trousseau is quite fresh. You, a bride, in a last year's hat! It would never do, and particularly as the fashion has radically altered this spring. I never encourage extravagance, as you well know; but that, my dear cousin, would be parsimony. We went on purpose for you to see the new hats and toques that Clematis has just brought home from Paris. A sweet one was in absinthe green straw, with an immense curve upwards of the rather wide brim at the left. It was trimmed with Malmaison roses and their foliage, happily imitated from nature. The brim was lined with black straw, which made it most becoming. It is not every complexion that can stand the proximity of green, you know. Another pretty hat was in porcelain grey straw, with fine lines of black chip, producing a good effect upon it. Under the brim the straw was plain blue, quite a turquoise tone. The trimming was quite flat, and consisted of feathers black chiffon, with a feather placed deftly under the brim, and a little pale blue introduced upon the hair—not too much, which is a frequent mistake.

A toque of the new hyacinth-blue straw sewn on chiffon and thus rendered as pliable as satin or velvet, was very wide indeed above the brow, and was trimmed with periwinkle blossoms and an upright aigrette of loops of the straw and its chiffon foundation. A large steel buckle brightened the back. Very attractive was a black jet toque trimmed with shaded periwinkle feathers and with a few flowers under the brim. A novelty in toques was made of pith and straw in cream-colour, the trimming consisting of blue feathers on spotted black chenille. Twisted sprays of blue orchids formed an aigrette, black velvet ribbon being run through the pith.

Bonnets are in again, after a couple of seasons' oblivion. We saw a pretty one made of fine green chip with blue forget-me-nots arranged in a garland round it. The shape was the sabot, or Olivia, and even at the back the straw rose in a sabot peak. One tall blue feather added its up-to-date note to the composition. A toque bonnet was in Malmaison pink straw tilted up at the left with three sequined wings, and held, as they were, by a great clump of roses. There were long black velvet strings to this toque-bonnet.

Clematis' capes are very light and dainty. They are lined with glacé silk, either cream-colour or in a decided tint contrasting with the grey or pale drab of the cloth itself. A fawn cloth was lined with emerald green glacé, the frills round it being pinked out and coming to the front, where they mingled with those of the cloth. Lace ruffles with long ends, chiffon ties in all pale colours, and fichus in point d'esprit, were other tempting novelties from which we tore ourselves away.

These chocolate sandwiches are quite new and very delicate for afternoon tea:—

Beat 6 oz. of butter and 6 oz. of glebe sugar together until they are creamy, add 3 oz. of grated chocolate, and 3 eggs, beating each one in separately; mix in 6 oz of bread-crumbs, spread the mixture on a greased and papered baking-sheet, and bake fifteen minutes in a moderate oven. Then turn the cake on to a sheet of paper, and cut it into rounds before it cools. Beat 4 oz. of butter with 6 oz. of sifted icing sugar, adding a few drops of extract of coffee and 2 oz. of dissolved chocolate. Spread the icing between the rounds of cake, and pipe the surface of the sandwiches with white icing; sprinkle it with coarse grains of sugar that are coloured a pretty pink with a few drops of cochineal.

Fillets of sole à la Bellevue make a pretty dish for a cold collation:—

Trim the fillets of a large Torbay sole and the fillets of a fresh haddock. Put the bones and trimmings on to boil to make stock for the sauce. Pound the flesh of the haddock until it is smooth, adding 2 oz. of butter, pepper, salt, a pinch of cayenne pepper, and the yolks of three eggs. Pound the ingredients until they are thoroughly amalgamated; then rub them through a hair sieve. Spread the forcemeat on half of each of the fillets and fold the other half over. Place them on a buttered baking sheet, season them with pepper, salt, and lemon juice, cover them with a greased paper, moisten them with a little of the fish stock, and cook them about half an hour in a moderate oven; then drain the fish from the liquor. Now divide the fillets in halves lengthways, coat the thick part with white sauce and the smaller end with pink sauce. When the sauce is quite set, pour a little dissolved aspic jelly over them and arrange them on a silver dish with nicely shred salad and chopped aspic jelly.

To make the fish sauce:—Dissolve an ounce of butter in a stewpan, mix in a tablespoonful of flour, and the fish stock, which should be reduced to a gill and a half, stir all until it is boiling, simmer it fifteen minutes, then squeeze it through the tammy, return the sauce to the stewpan, stir in a gill of cream gradually, add pepper, salt, a teaspoonful of lemon juice, a sheet of soaked gelatine, and a tablespoonful of aspic jelly. Stir the sauce on the ice until it is cooling. Put a portion of the sauce into another stewpan, and colour it a pretty pink with a little carmine, and use at once to coat the fish.

Chocolate rock cakes are very good, and easy to make:

Beat 4 oz. of butter with 4 oz. of glebe sugar until it is creamy, add 2 oz. of grated chocolate, 2 eggs, 6 oz. of fine flour, and half a teaspoonful of baking powder. Drop the mixture in rocky form on to a greased baking sheet, and bake it about twenty minutes in a quick oven.

Stewed pears (Brighton way):—

Wash the pears, then peel very thin; put half the paring at the bottom of your stewing jar, then pack the pears; add sugar, a blade of cinnamon, a few shreds of lemon-peel, then pour over sufficient wine. Place in the rest of the paring, and put the lid on closely. Set in a moderate oven for six or seven hours. When ready, dish the pears whole and cold, between heaps of whipped cream. The pears should be of a pink shade.

Ever, dear, your loving cousin, MADGE.

P.S.—Another lecture and demonstration on Indian Cookery, by Chef Veerasawmy, is announced for Wednesday at Debenham & Freebody's. We are going, of course.

ARISTOCRACY AND EVOLUTION. A Study of the Rights, the Origin, and the Social Functions of the Wealthier Classes. By W. H. Mallock, Author of "Labour and the Popular Welfare," "Classes and Masses," &c.

"He does not envelop the subject in a cloud of philosophic phraseology, he is always lucid and orderly, and he relieves his argument by welcome touches of satire and humour. His last book shows no deficiency in these qualities, and it is also perhaps the most complete and sustained effort of reasoning which he has so far produced."—Literature.

THE STORY OF GLADSTONE'S LIFE. By Justin McCarthy, M.P. Containing 45 Illustrations, mostly Page Portraits representing Mr. Gladstone at different periods. In 1 vol., extra crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, price 7s. 6d.

"Is really a gem of theological constructive criticism. With marvellous lucidity and penetration, Dr. Sabatier states for us here the philosophy and natural history of the dogma, its position and use in the Christian evolution."—Christian World.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho-square, London.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE OPEN BOAT, AND OTHER STORIES.

By STEPHEN CRANE, Author of "The Red Badge of Courage."

THE LONDONERS: AN ABSURDITY

By ROBERT HICHENS, Author of "The Green Carnation."

Punch.—"One of the most outrageous pieces of extravagant absurdity we have come across for many a day."

DREAMERS OF THE GHETTO.

By I. ZANGWILL.

The Academy.—"No one can rise from reading the 'Dreamers of the Ghetto' without perceiving that he has been in the presence of a master. Mr. Zangwill is the prose-poet of atmosphere. He lifts the air from the seventeenth century; he enables us to breathe it."

THE LAKE OF WINE.

By BERNARD CAPES.

Mr. W. E. Henley in the Outlook.—"I have read no book for long which contented me as this book. This story—excellently invented and excellently done—is one no lover of romance can afford to leave unread."

THE WAR OF THE WORLDS.

By H. G. WELLS, Author of "The Time Machine."

The Spectator.—"As a writer of scientific romance, Mr. Wells has never been surpassed. Even when he is most awful there is always something human about his characters. Both Poe and Mr. Wells are followers of Swift, but Mr. Wells keeps nearest to the human side of the author of 'Gulliver.'"

THE MINISTER OF STATE.

By J. A. STEUART, Author of "In the Day of Battle."

The World.—"Its qualities place it far above the novels we are accustomed to, even of the higher class. It is dramatic, romantic, and realistic."

KING CIRCUMSTANCE.

By EDWIN PUGH, Author of "A Street in Suburbia."

The Pall Mall Gazette.—"Throughout, Mr. Pugh displays a deft conciseness and ease of workmanship that are exceptional. Distinctly, he is high above the ruck, and he should go far."

THE SCOURGE-STICK.

By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED.

The Daily Telegraph.—"Undeniably powerful and interesting."

MERESIA.

By Winifred Graham, Author of "A Strange Solution," &c.

"There is much that is clever and original in Miss Winifred Graham's latest book. Meresia is an interesting and a life-like character, and the two Spaniards, Aladros and Serano, are also well drawn. The book is well worth reading, if only for the picture it gives us of 'the fascination of hate.'"—Daily Telegraph.

NEW NOVEL BY LEWIS SERGEANT.

Now ready, in 1 vol. crown 8vo, 6s.

THE CAPRICE OF JULIA.

By Lewis Sergeant.

"In reading 'The Caprice of Julia,' one is especially struck by the excellence of the style; it is at once easy, flowing, and in phrase and tone eminently characteristic of the supposed autobiographer, the admiring young gentleman who is made to feel most keenly 'the caprice of Julia.' Altogether, the book, being freshly and agreeably written, is sure to find admirers."—Globe.

CAUTION.

Owing to the phenomenal success of this popular Scent, some perfumers are offering essences of their own manufacture under the name of "RHINE VIOLETS." The public must not be deceived but insist upon "MULHENS'" brand, which is distilled from the flower itself. Don't accept any bottle not bearing Ferd. Mülhens' name. This alone ensures genuineness. Ferd. Mülhens, of Cologne, is the originator of this exquisite perfume, and was the first to introduce it into England.

The Fashionable Press of London are unanimous in praise of it.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company is formed to take over as a going concern as from the 1st of January, 1898, and to extend the business of Messrs. Stevenson & Howell, Manufacturing Chemists, Distillers and Importers of Essential Oils and Essences of all kinds, Manufacturers of Colours, Technical Chemicals, &c.

The customers of the business include leading firms in the following Wholesale and Manufacturing Trades:—Biscuit Manufacturers, Wholesale Grocers, Manufacturing Confectioners, Mineral Water Manufacturers, Wholesale Chemists and Druggists, Soap Makers and Perfumers, and other Manufacturers.

The business is carried on at the following premises, viz.:—Standard Works, 95A, Southwark-street, Old Paris Gardens, Southwark, Gravel-lane, Southwark, with Branch Offices at Manchester and Glasgow. There are also established Agencies in many parts of the world, including Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Sydney, and Melbourne.

The business premises in Southwark-street are held on long leases (the terms of years unexpired varying from 64 years to 75 years) at low ground rents.

The accounts of the firm have been made up to the 31st of December in each year, and the Balance Sheet dated 31st December, 1897, which can be seen by intending Subscribers at the Offices of the Auditors, shows that the assets of the firm amounted at that date to £72,926, subject to trade liabilities, which were only £3,738.

These assets are exclusive of the goodwill of the business, the value of which forms a large additional security for the Preference Shares.

The following is a copy of the Certificate of Messrs. Jackson, Pixley, & Co., of 58, Coleman-street, E.C., who have examined the books of the firm:—

58, Coleman-street, London, March 29th, 1898.

To the Directors of STEVENSON & HOWELL, Limited.

Gentlemen,—We have examined the Books and Accounts of Messrs. Stevenson & Howell for the three completed years ended at 31st December, 1897, and certify that the net profits of their business were as follows:—

For the year ending 31st December,	1895	... ...	£15,130
Do. do.	1896	... ...	£15,737
Do. do.	1897	... ...	£17,747

These profits have not been charged with interest on Capital, but adequate allowance has been made annually for depreciation of leaseholds and plant. We have also ascertained that the net profits of the last ten years have been continuously progressive.

We are, Gentlemen, your obedient Servants,
Jackson, Pixley, Browning, Husey, & Co., Chartered Accountants.

The average of the net profits for the years 1895, 1896, and 1897 amounts to £16,205; which amount is more than sufficient to pay the interest upon the present issue of Preference Capital four times over.

The net earnings of the business have for many years been steadily increasing; and the sales during the early months of 1898 largely exceed those of any corresponding period.

The assets acquired by the Company include an ample amount for present working capital, and the Vendors guarantee the book debts due to the firm on the 31st of December, 1897.

The price to be paid for the business, inclusive of the profits accrued since the 1st of January, 1898, is £160,000, payable as to £80,000 in cash and as to £80,000 in Ordinary Shares.

The balance of the Preference and Ordinary Share Capital, amounting to £40,000, is reserved to be issued from time to time to provide further Working Capital, such as will become necessary with the expansion of the business.

There will be no change in the management, the Board consisting of the partners in the present firm (who bind themselves to give their services to the business for a period of at least seven years) and their Head Manager in London.

The Vendors will pay all expenses connected with the formation of the Company, up to and including the first allotment of Shares, and the expenses of the transfer of the properties to the Company including all stamp duties.

No promotion money has been or will be paid, and no part of the issue has been underwritten or guaranteed. The only contract (other than current trade contracts) is dated the 13th day of April, 1898, and is made between the Vendors of the one part and R. G. Barnes, as Trustee for the Company, of the other part.

Application will be made in due course for an official quotation of the Preference Shares on the Stock Exchange.

Applications for Preference Shares should be made on the Form accompanying the Prospectus or that below, and be sent to the Company's Bankers with the amount payable on application.

If the full amount applied for be not allotted, the surplus paid on deposit will be applied towards payment of the amount due on allotment. Where no allotment is made, the deposit will be returned in full. Non-payment of the amount due on allotment will render the application money liable to forfeiture.

A print of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, the original Certificate of Messrs. Jackson, Pixley & Co., and a copy of the above-mentioned contract of 13th April, 1898, may be seen at the offices of the Solicitors.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, Auditors, and Solicitors of the Company.

London, 20th April, 1898.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 993.—ENGLISH RENDERING OF FRENCH STANZAS FROM "TRILBY."

W. Nevermore (real name and address will be published in due course)... ... ... £2 2 0

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 996.

The Prize in this competition has been awarded to Dombey, whose sentence in its incomplete and complete form appeared in Truth for March 17 and April 7 respectively.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 999.

I must admit that I did not realise what a troublesome task I was preparing for myself when I gave this competition. The examination of the lists of answers has been a very lengthy operation, owing to the fact that a large proportion of the competitors succeeded in completing most of the given combinations of consonants. It was only after a very close comparison and scrutiny, that certain small errors were discovered in some of the answers. Thus, by an exhaustive process, the number of lists was gradually reduced until only four remained, viz., those sent by Lyswys, Dinah, Carradabia, and Leila. These four are, to the best of my belief, equally correct, and the prize will therefore be divided equally between them. Amongst those who were within an ace of winning and were, to use a sporting expression, only beaten on the post, were Dagmar, Maria, M. J. W., Strix, Spot, Thomasina, Oceania, and Trouvère. Many others were only another point behind. It may be interesting to point out that the sentences in which most of the competitors made mistakes were Nos. 9, 12, 21. Thus in No. 9 not a few competitors failed to make the words "soft Oloroso" and "Corton"; in No. 12 comparatively few inserted the words "at far Atbara"; and in No. 21 the word "Standard" at the end of the sentence proved the stumbling block. It may be well, also, to explain that with regard to certain misprints which occurred in the publication of the consonants (such as at the end of Sentence 17, for example), all competitors were placed upon the same footing.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,000.

The prize in this competition has been awarded to Beaumont for the following Acrostic on Alfred the Great:—

A cross the gulf of full a thousand years
L ooks backward lovingly the Motherland,
F rom her old age of honour and command.
R emembering her springtime and its tears.
E nthroned in safety, she no longer hears
D eath-boding war-cry of the Viking band,
T hat often ravaged her ill-guarded strand—
H arassed the shore which now no danger fears.
E arly-begotten offspring of her youth,
G reat elder brother of our island race,
R uler and captain, law-giver and saint,
E stablisher of peace, and tongue of Truth—
A lfred! —thy story gratefully we trace
T hrough the far centuries, remote and faint.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,004.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week for

The Best Humorous Song of Four Eight-lined Verses, Each of which must End with the Words, "He was such a Methodical Man."

The words just given will make it clear to competitors what the subject of their song is to be. No song must exceed four verses of eight lines in length. The metre used is left to the choice of the competitors, though this choice should, of course, be governed to some extent by the fact that the refrain already given is to form the last line of each verse. All answers must reach me by the morning of Monday, May 2, at the latest.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the Puzzle Editor, Truth Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand; whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

Answers to Correspondents.

 The real name, with the address, of Lucia, winner of Prize No. 998, is Miss Lucilla Smith, Kirklisten, St. James'-street, Nottingham.

C. M. P.—Your "Acrostic" arrived too late to be printed with the others.

Svonok.—The inclusion in an anagram of any word to be found in the original sentence should certainly be avoided.

Alastor.—Your answer is not really an anagram at all.

E. Marshall.—The anagram should not have contained more than thirty-six letters.

Singeon.—Many thanks for your letter and the suggestion it contains. I hope to turn it to practical account before long.

Myrah.—I shall certainly do so.

Needle.—The point you raise in your letter has not been overlooked, and care has been taken to prevent any competitor obtaining an unfair advantage.

Gosling.—I am sorry that I am unable to use your verses on "April."

Guillaumette.—Thanks for your post-card. The second line in your acrostic should, as you say, have been "in happy moment," not "moments."

The Girl.—It was intended that the sentences should be original, and I am much obliged to you for your communication.

Aughnaskeagh and Sam Trimmer.—The Acrostics you sent in were not of the kind required for Competition No. 1,000.

Blackthorn.—By an unintentional omission your definition of "Smart Society" was not printed with the rest, I therefore print it here. "The Society for the realisation of petty aims by superhuman exertions."

 Several Answers have been held over for another week.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company was formed in July, 1896, to acquire and carry on the well-known business of Messrs. Joseph Crosfield & Sons, Bank Quay Soap Works, Warrington, established in the year 1815, and now one of the largest and best-known Soap Manufacturing concerns in the world. In addition to the manufacture of soap, the Company are large manufacturers of caustic soda, silicate of soda, and chemically-pure glycerine. For the last-named article they are Contractors to Her Majesty's Government. During the past year the businesses of Messrs. D. C. Keeling & Co., and Messrs. Medley & Son, Soap Manufacturers, of Liverpool, have been purchased and absorbed by the Company. The Company's Works at Warrington are situated in an unique position. There are two railway sidings on the London & North-Western Railway (one on the main line, and the other on the Liverpool branch), both running through the works, and a quay on the River Mersey, which flows alongside and gives access to the Manchester Ship Canal, so that there is a double connection by water with Liverpool.

Messrs. Joseph Crosfield & Sons, Limited, are the proprietors and manufacturers of the well-known "Erasmic" Toilet Soap, and "Rainbow" and "Perfection" Household Soaps, in addition to a large number of other well-known brands, which have a good reputation both in the Home and Export markets. The Company has a large and steadily growing export trade with India, South Africa, Australia, and the Colonies generally, where their products, both soaps and chemicals, stand in high repute. The increasing demand for their specialities and the general expansion of the chemical branches of the business, have made it desirable to provide additional working capital for immediate extensions and additions to the Works and Plant, and the further development of the business both at home and abroad. The employes of the business number over 1,700, and there are upwards of 24,000 trade customers on the Books. It is proposed to make a judicious and liberal allotment to both classes of applicants.

The assets of the Company standing in the books at the date of the last stock-taking, together with additional Working Capital provided by this Issue, amount to £772,000, exclusive of the valuable goodwill of the business. Messrs. Voisey & Worthington, the Auditors to the Company, have given the following certificate:— 21, King-street, Warrington, 28th March, 1898.

To the Directors of Joseph Crosfield & Sons, Limited.

We have audited the Books of Messrs. Joseph Crosfield & Sons, Limited, since the incorporation of the Company, during which period extensive additions have been made to the Works and Plant. We certify that the net profits for the last 15 months, ended 28th February, 1898, without charging Debenture Interest or Directors' Fees, but after providing for depreciation and bad debts, amounted to over £60,000, or at the rate of over £48,000 per annum.

VOISEY & WORTHINGTON, Chartered Accountants.

The interest on the Debenture Stock requires	£12,675
The dividend upon the present issue of Pre-Preference Shares	10,000

whilst the present certified profits are at the rate of over £48,000 per annum. The holders of the Pre-Preference Shares will receive copies of the Annual Balance Sheet and Report of the Company, but have not the right to receive notice of or to attend or vote at general or other meetings except in cases directly affecting their interests.

The Company has entered into a contract, dated 23rd March, 1898, with Messrs. Williamson, Murray, & Co., relative to this issue. In addition to the said contract, there are also numerous agreements entered into by the Company since its incorporation, in the ordinary and usual course of its business, and Messrs. Williamson, Murray, & Co., have entered into sub-contracts, to which the Company is not a party, all of which may technically fall within Section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. Subscribers for Shares will be deemed to have had notice of all Contracts, and to have agreed with the Company (as Trustee for the Directors and other persons liable), to waive any claims against them for not more fully complying with the requirements in the said section or otherwise, and allotments will only be made upon this basis.

If the whole amount applied for by any applicant be not allotted, the surplus amount paid on application will be appropriated to the sum due on allotment. Where no allotment is made, the deposit will be returned in full. Copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, the Certificate of Messrs. Voisey & Worthington, and the Contract referred to can be inspected by applicants for Shares at the Registered Office of the Company. Applications will be made in due course for an official quotation of the present issue of Pre-Preference Shares on the London, Manchester, and Liverpool Stock Exchanges. Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, at the Registered Office of the Company, and from Messrs. Williamson, Murray, & Co., 1, Moorgate-place, London, E.C.—Warrington, 14th April, 1898. The Debenture Stocks of the Company are quoted in the official lists of the Manchester and Liverpool Stock Exchanges as follows, viz.:—

ENTRE NOUS.

By the express command of the Queen, the Countess Erbach-Schönberg, sister of Prince Henry of Battenberg, who has been on a visit to her Majesty at Cimiez, is described in the official "Court Circular" as "Her Serene Highness." As a matter of fact, Countess Erbach has no more right to the "style" than to the rank of Imperial Majesty, and, of course, it is only at our own Court that she would be described as "Serene Highness;" and even in the Queen's own Palace she would not take precedence as "Serene Highness" on any full-dress occasion. The Queen can please herself at home in these matters, but such irregularities are not recognised at foreign Courts, as was discovered after Prince Albert had been made Prince Consort, and it turned out that abroad he gained nothing by the promotion.

There is no foundation for the report that the Emperor and Empress of Russia are to visit the Queen at Balmoral during the autumn. It is unlikely that the Emperor will leave Russia during the present year, but the Empress will probably go to Germany in the summer for some time, as she has been advised to take a course of waters at Schwalbach, and in this case she will spend the early autumn at Heiligenberg, near Darmstadt, with her eldest sister, Princess Louis of Battenberg.

I hear that the German Emperor will pay a brief visit to the Queen at Balmoral early in June. The Emperor is to come from Kiel to Aberdeen in the Imperial yacht, and after his trip to Balmoral he will proceed on a cruise to Norway.

The Prince of Wales, who is to return on Friday evening to Marlborough House from Newmarket, will be joined in town by the Princess and her daughters on Monday next, and the Royal party are to pay a visit to the Queen at Windsor Castle in the course of next week.

The Prince is to entertain the members of the Jockey Club at dinner at Marlborough House on Wednesday, May 25, being the evening of the Derby Day. H.R.H has accepted an invitation to dine with Lord Salisbury in Arlington-street on Saturday, May 21, at the Prime Minister's full-dress banquet, given to celebrate her Majesty's Birthday.

There is to be a special service next month in the St. George's Chapel, Windsor Castle, when the tomb of the late Duke of Clarence in the Albert Memorial Chapel is unveiled, at which the Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and several other members of the Royal family will be present. The tomb will be completed when the recumbent effigy of the Duke has been placed upon the sarcophagus which contains his coffin.

Lords Clarendon, Harris, and Kintore are successively to be the Lords-in-Waiting on the Queen during May, while Captain Walter Campbell, Mr. Alexander Yorke, and Captain Malcolm Drummond will be the Grooms-in-Waiting, and Sir John McNeill and Major Legge are to be the Equerries on duty. Mr. Henniker Major and Mr. Festing will be the Pages-of-Honour in Waiting in the Throne Room at the two Drawing Rooms. Dowager Lady Ampthill, Dowager Lady Erroll, and Dowager Lady Churchill will be the Ladies-in-Waiting during the month.

I understand that the Duke of Bedford is to replace the late Lord Exeter in the ancient Crown office of Custos Rotulorum of the Soke or Liberty of Peterborough.

Lord Cadogan spent most of last week in England, and did not return to the Viceregal Lodge until Saturday morning. This week the possible Cabinet meetings will not have the benefit of his counsels, the Punchestown race meeting being an event of national importance in Ireland, demanding the appearance of the Lord Lieutenant in State. Leopardstown races, on Friday and Saturday in the same week, have rapidly grown in importance, and most of the Punchestown visitors have the two days at Leopardstown as well. The hotels in Dublin and the neighbourhood are crowded for the week. The Sunday before Punchestown is quite an important festival at Kingstown, when crowds assemble on the piers to witness the influx of visitors brought by the mail boat from across the water in the afternoon.

Sir George Morris, the head of the Local Government Board in Ireland, has retired from the post owing to the age limit. The appointment of his successor, which has been deeply engaging the attention of the Chief Secretary, and all who have a voice in it, will, it is expected, be announced this week. Under the new Act, the importance of the place will be considerably increased. No narrowness of choice has created any difficulty in filling it, but rather an embarrassment of riches in the shape of those whose friends think them, or who themselves think that they are, fitted to fill the place. If an outsider of political importance is not selected, Mr. Henry Robinson, son of the late Sir H. Robinson, will succeed Sir G. Morris, Mr. Robinson being the senior official and next to Sir G. Morris on the Local Government Board.

Lord Oxenbridge was all his life a most staunch Liberal, and a devoted and unswerving supporter of Mr. Gladstone. He was a genial, hospitable, highly cultured man, and enjoyed a wide popularity. He was much liked in Lincolnshire, where for many years he took an active and a very useful part in County business, and he was a practical, sympathetic, and generous worker for the local charities, to which he gave most munificently down to the end of his life. Lord Oxenbridge was really killed by the collapse of the Liberator companies, with which he had allowed his name to be associated, with the very best motives, and with no idea whatever of obtaining any pecuniary benefit for himself. His health had been failing for several years, and he sustained a final crushing blow when his wife died a short time ago.

Mr. Alfred Cock, Q.C., was, like the late Sir Frank Lockwood, a burly and robust-looking man, and his voice and manner suggested that he had a constitution of iron. It is strange, indeed, that the two should have been suddenly and unexpectedly struck down within a few months of one another. Mr. Cock, though not in point of style an advocate of the first rank, worked his way to the front at an early age, partly by sheer force of character, and partly through the prevailing dearth of pre-eminent talent at the Bar. Now that he is gone, the litigant requiring the services of a first-rate common-law counsel will find his choice narrower than ever. Within the last three or four years the disappearance from the Bar of men like Lord Russell, Sir Frank Lockwood, Sir John Bigham, and Sir Arthur Channell, together with the renunciation of private practice by the Law Officers of the Crown, have given almost unprecedented openings to the rising generation of juniors; but up to the present it is difficult to find any individual who has availed himself of the opportunity.

The following case has been sent to me for ventilation:—

The other day a friend of mine found it needful to catch a train on the Underground Railway. The train was stationary on the platform, nevertheless the gate was barred. Naturally feeling that he had a duty to himself above red-tape regulations, and reasonably chafing against this most un-English restriction, he lightly leapt the offending obstacle. He was immediately seized upon by a guard of the usual incalculably stupid type, who tried to prevent his catching his most important train. Can any more flagrant specimen of bullying idiocy be conceived? Luckily my friend evaded this egregious functionary, and caught his train. For these circumstances he was prosecuted for assault, and fined by one of those sapient directors of the law who are such an ornament to the Bench.

This in itself was sufficient farce; but the best of the joke was a homily delivered in court on the subject of how gentlemen should behave on the Underground Railway, which emanated from the company's attorney—of all people in the world. The defendant might in return have delivered a counter oration on the duties of railway companies towards their passengers, and on the question whether perfectly peaceful citizens, like my friend, are to be browbeaten by official roughs, and then penalised as breakers of the peace. . . .

I publish this eloquent and vigorous statement of the rights of a free Briton, in order to oblige a friend, but it strikes me that my friend's case is not as strong as his language. Railway companies, I take it, have their rights as well as passengers, and one of their rights—I am not sure whether it is not a duty—is to make reasonable rules and regulations for the management of their traffic in the way which best suits their convenience and that of the public. A train on the Underground Railway stops in each station about twenty seconds, which is barely time—as many know to their cost—for those who are on the platform when the train pulls up to find seats. If the gates were not closed when the train draws up, people would risk their lives by entering trains in motion even more frequently than they do at present.

It may be said that a free Briton has a right to risk his life if he pleases. This is only true within certain limits. The Briton who, when travelling by rail, risks his life, and injures, without killing himself in so doing, is the first to turn round afterwards, and impute the whole blame to the company. Should the company retort that he is the only person to blame, he will probably take them before a jury to settle the question. The company on their side have therefore a right to place restrictions on the natural right of the free Briton to risk his own life.

Apart, however, from their own protection, I should say that the company have also a duty in this matter towards those passengers who have no desire to risk their own lives, and who have an objection to see other people risk their lives in their presence. As a passenger on the Underground Railway myself, I have the very strongest possible aversion to the individual who rushes at your carriage door just as the train is leaving the station, and horrifies half-a-dozen of his fellow creatures by forcing them to become spectators of his efforts at self-destruction. I have never disputed the right of every man to commit suicide, but I do contend in the strongest way that the man who wants to destroy himself should do it quietly and unostentatiously, and with every possible regard for the sensibilities of those who prefer to remain in this world. For these reasons I hold that the Metropolitan Railway Company are fully justified in closing their gates when a train arrives in the station, that their officials are justified in stopping anybody who breaks their wholesome regulations, and that magistrates are justified in fining those who break by-laws and assault officials in the attempt to enter trains in motion.

I am glad to find that there are plenty of people who share the views which I expressed the other day somewhat tentatively as to the cruelty of fattening poultry by machinery. The process seems to be carried out systematically in the principal poultry-growing district of Sussex, round Heathfield, and people who have had any experience of it are pretty well agreed that it is detestably cruel. However, there is no abuse which will not find defenders, and I have had one letter in defence of this system. Here it is :—

Sir,—I never did read such rot as your remarks about fattening poultry by machinery. Any one would think, to hear you talk, that it is a misfortune to be fat, or that taking a little more food than we have an appetite for was a kind of torture. Why does a man take a sherry and bitters before dinner? Why does he have spicy and dainty dishes put before him as dinner goes on? Why, so that he shall make the most of his time and chances when there is a good feed ready for him. You can't give a fowl sherry and bitters, but you can encourage his appetite with a little gentle pressure from a hand pump; and what's the difference—in principle? Torture, indeed! I call it doing a kindness.

Besides, where are the plump spring chickens to come from if no one's to assist Nature by putting them on the market early in the season? Are we to wait till the birds have fattened themselves at their leisure—maybe the middle of July, when the grouse are almost in sight? Perhaps you don't know either how much superior eating they are when fattened artificially. And who is going to compensate the poultry growers if they are to keep the birds for months before putting them on the market, perhaps miss the London season, and not get half the price for them even then?

You mind your own business, and don't go interfering with legitimate industry. And don't you make any mistake about its being a torture to have a good bellyful; take my word for that.—Yours obediently, Liveryman and Poulterer.

Heaven forbid that I should question the joy which any Liveryman derives from overfeeding himself. Neither do I grudge him this innocent enjoyment, which hurts nobody if it does not hurt himself. I question, however, whether a spring chicken derives the same satisfaction as a City Alderman from a sense of repletion, or whether his interior economy is equally fit to bear the strain. In the City of London—and in the West End also, for the matter of that—men get hardened to this process by years of practice. To bring the thing to a test, what I should like to do would be to take a fat Alderman after a City banquet, when he has begun with his "sherry and bitters," and gone through the whole series of "dainty and spicy dishes" until he could literally swallow no more, and then put an india-rubber tube down his throat, and force boiled mutton or beef steak pudding into him by hydraulic pressure. If after that he considered that I had done him an act of "kindness," and that there was no torture in a good bellyful, then I would abandon the cause of the Heathfield chicken.

A correspondent writes :—

I have just been informed, much to my surprise, that I am considered extremely mean for sending out invitations to dinner, and also to a wedding, with only a halfpenny stamp. I find from the Post Office that as the invitations are printed matter, they can be sent in unfastened envelopes at the postage of one halfpenny; and I do not quite see why I should pay the Post Office twice the amount they ask out of compliment to my guests, any more than I should expect my own correspondents to put twopence instead of a penny on their ordinary letters out of compliment to me. But perhaps I am wrong. What say you?

I am glad to take an opportunity of saying that I entirely agree with my correspondent, for people are continually asking me to gibbet others who have been guilty of this strange form of meanness. A more senseless complaint I have never heard. If it is a mark of meanness to send an invitation at the ordinary postal rate, where is the line to be drawn? If it is a compliment to your guest to use a penny instead of a halfpenny stamp, you will increase the compliment by putting on a twopenny, sixpenny, or shilling one. The requirements of hospitality already necessitate the throwing away of quite enough money on snobbish ostentation without this. Should friends of mine in sending invitations desire to pay me a compliment of this kind, I would ask them to kindly put the surplus stamps inside instead of outside the envelope.

I am asked to mention that the annual dinner of the Newsvendors' Benevolent and Provident Institution will take place at the Hotel Cecil on Wednesday, May 11, Mr. Cecil B. Harmsworth taking the chair.

In the meantime, perhaps Mr. Harmsworth and others connected with the production of newspapers may like to hear the following growl from the distributing branch of the industry. It comes from a well-known newsagent, apropos of the threatened publication of Sunday editions of various daily papers, with the view of satisfying the supposed public thirst for "war news":—

If, as we trust, you agree with us that the newsagent, being a human being and not a machine, requires some rest, we hope you will assist us against this new attempt to introduce seven-day-a-week journals. If one or two daily papers begin to publish Sunday editions, the rest will necessarily follow suit very quickly, when the newsagent, who already works from early morning till late in the evening, six days a week, and half-a-day on the seventh, and has been deprived of all share in Christmas, Easter, and other holidays, will get absolutely no rest at all on any day in the year. You will remember that when the New York Herald tried the seven days' plan with its London edition, the refusal of the trade to take it up settled the question. We had hoped it was settled for good.

If the public wants morning and evening papers on Sunday, it will get them, just as it gets its Sunday milk or its Sunday cabs. I am sorry for "the trade," but I fear that it will have to adapt its hours of business to the requirements of the public, or go to the wall. That is one of the laws of commercial enterprise and competition which I have no power to alter. Whether the public, however, wants any more Sunday papers than it is provided with already, I doubt. Certainly it does not want the streets of London paraded on Sunday afternoons and evenings by leather-lunged louts bawling sensational lies to sell "Speshul Edishuns," in the manner of which we had the first taste last Sunday. So far as I can judge, there is a growing feeling that the evening newspaper trade, as carried on in the streets, is developing into a public nuisance; and I have even met with similar opinions about the Sunday morning papers. If the latest editions of evening papers are to be cried round the residential districts of London all Sunday afternoon and evening, the more influential section of the public will speedily demand that the trade shall be placed under some restrictions.

The public must be mad indeed if they are prepared to go on for long disbursing halfpennies and pennies for such flimsy facts and palpable fictions as have been offered as "war news" during the last few days. Seldom have the compilers of contents bills and the imaginations of the street boys indulged in such a riotous saturnalia of mendacity as London was treated to on Saturday and Sunday. On Monday, again, every morning paper devoted whole pages to the absorbing theme, without, so far as I could discover, having a single incident of any interest to chronicle, beyond the capture or stoppage of one or two inoffensive trading steamers by American warships. One evening paper published itself on Sunday with the kindly intention of "alleviating public anxiety." With this view a stupid story was promulgated about the Paris (which had previously been chased by one newsagency into Totland Bay) having "passed through the Needles," which would do about as much to alleviate public anxiety as an announcement that the vessel had crossed the Brighton Downs. The Paris was seen "passing through the Needles" by a special correspondent who had been despatched to Hurst Castle. We shall have some enterprising journal announcing next that "in order to alleviate public anxiety" it has sent a special commissioner to Margate from Saturday to Monday. It strikes me that there is a great opening at the present moment for an editor who would have the courage to announce that his paper will contain no "war news" until something happens worth reporting.

My Paris correspondent the other day attributed to Henri IV. the mot that James I., "the British Solomon," was the son of David, meaning Rizzio. I am told by one of my readers that this robs the poet Milton of the only joke that has ever been attributed to him. The true version of the story is said to be that some one asked in Milton's presence why on earth so foolish a man should be called Solomon, to which Milton replied, "Because he was the son of David." What authority there may be for this I do not know. The idea of John Milton, of all men that ever lived, making a joke bordering on the risky, strikes me as incongruous; but, after all, I suppose that the Puritans were only human.

There is a strong feeling at Oxford against pluralities, and there has been some acrimonious comment in the University on the arrangement by which Mr. Pelham, the new President of Trinity, continues to hold the Camden Professorship of Ancient History, in spite of his election to a headship. The income of this chair is principally paid by another college, but the salary of the President of Trinity is reduced if he also holds a professorship, so that his college is practically saving a considerable sum of money every year at the expense of another foundation. It has therefore been decided to devote to the Bodleian and the Ashmolean Museums the greater part of the sum which is saved to the college by the President being a Professor, and it may be hoped that this precedent will be followed hereafter if a similar case occurs.

There are 240 names in the Mods. List at Oxford, which was issued last week, there being forty-four in the first class, 106 in the second, and seventy-seven in the third, while thirteen candidates were considered unworthy to be classed. There were also eleven females who were not notably successful. New College, which sent thirty-one candidates, had seven firsts, the same number with which Balliol last year headed the list. Balliol (which sent up twenty-one men) had five firsts, and so also had Trinity, and then came Brasenose and Magdalen with four each. No fewer than seven colleges failed to obtain any firsts at all. One college sent up twenty candidates, not one of whom was in the first class, and six of its men were unclassed!

It is stated at Cambridge that Dr. Kirkpatrick, who has been elected Master of Selwyn College, will retain the Regius Professorship of Hebrew, to which a Canonry in Ely Cathedral is annexed. Dr. Kirkpatrick was appointed to the Chair by Mr. Gladstone in 1882, on the death of Professor Jarrett.

Canon Dalton, of Windsor, who was private tutor for several years to the late Duke of Clarence and to the Duke of York, has replaced Dean Farrar as the Deputy Clerk of the Closet in Waiting on the Queen. The appointed preachers at the Chapel Royal, St. James's Palace, during May are:—1st, the Sub-Dean; 8th, Prebendary Daniel Moore; 15th, Canon Hervey, Rector of Sandringham; 22nd, Dr. Gee, Canon of Windsor; 29th, the Sub-Dean.

Canon Scott Holland is to be the Canon-in-residence and Sunday afternoon preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral during May, succeeding Canon Newbolt; and at Westminster Abbey, Canon Gore, who has been on duty for two months, will be replaced by Canon Wilberforce.

There is not the slightest foundation for the statement of a contemporary that Mr. Balfour has offered the important Crown living of All Souls, Langham-place, to the Rev. Compton Reade, Vicar of Kenchester, and how such a report can ever have arisen it is impossible to conjecture. All Souls is worth about £700 a year, and this benefice has frequently proved a stepping-stone to much higher preferment. The incumbents have invariably been Low Churchmen.

The announcement of the appointment of the Rev. James MacArthur, Vicar of All Saints, South Acton, to the Bishopric of Bombay has been received in Church circles with unbounded surprise and extreme disapproval. Lord George Hamilton has obliged an influential constituent; but Mr. MacArthur is an ecclesiastic who is absolutely unknown outside the boundaries of his own parish, and it cannot be pretended that he possesses any special qualifications whatever for an Indian See, unless entire and absolute ignorance of India is a recommendation in the eyes of the Secretary of State. It would have been very much better to appoint a divine who has had some experience of India, and who would therefore possess a certain amount of knowledge of the peculiar nature of the work which has to be done there.

There will be some fun shortly in the House of Lords, as Lord Grimthorpe is going to move a resolution on the subject of the Ritualistic practices which have now become so common, and it is said that he intends to give the Episcopal Bench a rare dressing, the Bishop of London coming in for specially caustic criticism

The following letter has reference to the statistics given in TRUTH a fortnight ago respecting the proportion of income to inhabitants in some of the country parishes of the Church of England :—

SIR,—As a Dissenter (Unitarian) allow me to say that I think your attack on the Church of England for paying clergymen to minister to small and sparse populations is an injustice to that organisation. One of the virtues of the Establishment (heartily as I condemn the principle of the Establishment) is that it covers the whole ground, and leaves no district without its minister in religious things. None of the parishes mentioned has an excessive stipend for an educated man. . . . . It is much to the credit of the Church of England that it has a minister appointed to the most sparsely-populated districts.

This Nonconformist takes a much more kindly view of certain aspects of the Establishment than I, who am a Conformist. It is hardly accurate to say that the Church of England, which means the Church of to-day, "pays the country clergy." They are paid by the generosity of individuals deceased many centuries ago, who either gave land or imposed charges for this purpose. Neither does it seem to me a merit for the Church to "cover the whole ground," unless it also covers the whole population. The Church is concerned with the people, not with the land; and until the Church has the means to meet all the calls upon it in the large towns, it is an absurd waste of its strength and resources for single ministers to be detached for the purpose of ministering to a population of twenty or thirty people in a country parish. I did not, however, attack the Church for this. What I deprecated was its appealing for more money while the resources it possesses are thus wasted.

Again, a curate writes to point out that the same figures in TRUTH are fallacious, unless the area of each parish is given as well as the population. His argument is that, if a parish priest has a small flock scattered over an area of several square miles, they may occupy quite as much of his time as a much larger flock concentrated within a small radius. "Many a parish," he says, "in the mountainous districts of Cumberland or Wales, or in the now deserted country districts, may have a very small population, but in such cases the area to be traversed by the clergyman in the performance of his duties would be a more accurate criterion of the work to be done than the figures in TRUTH." There might be something in this argument if every clergyman spent the whole of his time in tramping from house to house, praying with or instructing his parishioners. But if my clerical correspondent intends to suggest that in any of the cases I gave, where a parish comprises less than twenty houses, the whole time of the vicar or rector is thus occupied, I can only recommend him to tell that story to the Marines. Take the most striking case in my list—an incumbent with an income of £230 and a house, and a flock of fifty-seven, contained in fourteen houses. How many times in the year does the vicar call at each of these fourteen houses? And how much of his time is spent in walking from one to the other?

Let us suppose that in the present day some pious millionaire proposed to endow the Church with a capital sum worth £300 a year. I put it to my friend the Unitarian, and my friend the curate, whether it would occur to any man of business to endow a priest and a church to minister, for all time to come, to some fifty or sixty people, including children. The mere suggestion is preposterous. Any man acting on ordinary business principles would employ his money where the largest number of people would get the benefit of it. All these local parochial endowments were created ages ago, when the social circumstances of the country were utterly different from what they are to-day. The parochial organisation in the country districts is, in fact, obsolete. The Church ought to recognise this fact, and take steps to put the endowments to better use.

I do not say that the scattered population of the country districts should be left without benefit of clergy. I appreciate my Unitarian friend's respect for the principle of "covering the whole ground." But if the ground is to be covered, it should be covered by itinerant priests. You do not require at this date a resident man in each parish in order to minister spiritually to the scattered residents of a parish in Wales or Cumberland. In these days of railways, not to mention bicycles, a travelling priest could without difficulty supply all the requirements of a dozen such parishes. To allocate one man to each, and to fix him down there with a house and two or three hundred a year, is a waste of strength and money. I would go further, and say that it is bad for the man himself.

All this has arisen out of my remarks on the appeals on behalf of the Queen Victoria Clergy Sustentation Fund. To go back to that subject, I hear from a clergyman in the diocese of Oxford that at the last Diocesan Conference the Bishop accepted from him a resolution pledging the Conference to the opinion that any Clergy Sustentation Fund which does not help the unbeneficed clergy, especially the elderly unbeneficed, would be inadequate and unsatisfactory; but the motion came on towards the end of the meeting, when there was no time left for discussion. Subsequently, the proposer wrote to Sir Charles Ryan, and received a reply to the effect that the case of curates would certainly be considered. This Vicar now remarks that he feels unwilling to comply with the request that had been made to him to devote offertories to the fund; and he says that he would rather have an offertory for the benefit of his own curates—a very sound view which I commend to other clerics.

From a paragraph in a local paper it seems that the amiable scheme of the Rector of St. James's, Colchester, for rendering his church agreeable to all sections of his parishioners has miscarried. As mentioned in last week's TRUTH, the Rector offered to provide extra services in every style desired, if those dissatisfied with the existing ceremonial would meet him at a given time, and confer on the arrangements. At the time appointed for the purpose, however, not a single individual presented himself. It may be that the Rector cast his pearls before swine, and that they may yet turn again and rend him. Or it may be that every soul in the parish is perfectly satisfied with things as they are. But it is quite certain that a great opportunity for imparting an entirely novel character to the Church of England has been lost. What a chance it would offer to a modern Vicar of Bray if he could hold in succession every Sunday services to suit every taste, from that of the Roman Catholic to that of the Plymouth Brother!

Bishops are not alone in talking nonsense on Sunday cycling. Following on the speech of the Bishop of Oxford, discussed in last week's TRUTH, a reverend fanatic at Exeter has gone so far as deplore the depravity of members of his own profession, who actually ride to their places of worship on bicycles on the Sabbath! Now where does the difference between walking and cycling come in, except that the latter is pleasanter, perhaps, and certainly much quicker? Sunday is the one opportunity afforded to a large portion of the working community to take a modicum of healthful exercise, and obtain a glimpse of the green fields which year by year are retreating farther from London; and yet this reverend person would —if he had the power—put a stop to a really healthy and sensible entertainment, and drive its numerous votaries to much more questionable methods of disposing of their leisure.

Naturally my sporting correspondent has excited the wrath of many clerics by asserting that sermons do more than bicycles to empty churches. I cannot answer one quarter of those who have written to me on the subject; but I am much struck by the remark of one parson—who writes very sympathetically and reasonably on the cycle question—that to discourse to the same people on the same topic (however attractive in itself) 104 times in the year, and to continue at it year after year, "would tax even my versatility." I have never occupied a pulpit, and we none of us know what we can do till we try; but I admit that stated in this way the difficulty of making sermons attractive looks a formidable one.

At the same time, I must say that the sameness of the preacher and the sameness of the congregation and the sameness of the subject, do not entirely excuse the uniform flatness, staleness, and unprofitableness of the majority of sermons. It is my fate to have to produce fifty-two numbers of TRUTH every year. Every week we are the same writers. To the extent of 99 per cent, I should say that we have every week the same readers. And if you look through the files of this or any other paper you will find, taking one year with another, a surprising similarity in the subjects dealt with. The line between the parson and the journalist does not seem so very broad when you come to measure it closely. Yet somehow or other TRUTH manages to interest its readers week by week, as is proved by the infallible test that the number of copies of the paper bought and sold is ever on the increase; and the same thing may be said of every other successful journal. Why then the difference between the popularity of the parson's discourse and the journalist's? I must say that I think the fault must lie chiefly with the parson.

Perhaps it would be more just to say "misfortune" than "fault." An orator is born, not made, and parsons cannot be selected solely, or even chiefly, for his oratorical powers. It would probably be a misfortune for the Church if they were, for your pulpit orator is rarely of the stuff of which good parish priests are made. The best way, therefore, to improve sermons would be to abolish them as a regular and necessary adjunct to Divine Worship, and to employ a special order of clerics—preachers, and nothing else—to fill the pulpits on occasions when an original discourse was considered necessary.

In reference to a complaint, noticed in TRUTH of the 14th inst., respecting the management of the Dublin Branch of the Army and Navy Pensioners Employment Society, the Secretary of that Society informs me that the books show that out of 184 pensioners who have got employment through the Society 119 were Roman Catholics and 65 Protestants. This, I think, disposes sufficiently of the suggestion that Protestants have been unduly favoured. I still think, however, that it would be a good thing if there were a Committee on the spot to supervise the working of the office and hear any complaints from applicants. The Edinburgh office referred to in a subsequent paragraph of the same issue appears to have been that of the Association for Employment of Discharged and Reserve Soldiers—not the Pensioners' Employment Society.

I am asked to mention that a matinée in aid of the funds of the very poor parish of Holy Cross, St. Pancras, will be given by Mr. Charles Wyndham at the Criterion Theatre on Tuesday, May 10. On this occasion "Still Waters Run Deep" will be performed by a very strong company, including Mr. Charles Wyndham, Mr. Lewis Waller, Mrs. Bernard Beere, and Miss Mary Moore. Tickets may be obtained either at the theatre or of Mrs. Albert Moore, Holy Cross Vicarage.

Another forthcoming charity function claiming notice is the festival dinner in aid of the Royal Ophthalmic Hospital. This will take place at the Grand Hotel, Charing Cross, on Friday, May 6, the Duke of Cambridge presiding.

By a curious blunder Ashore and Afloat was referred to in last week's TRUTH as a publication of the Royal Humane Society, instead of the Royal Naval Temperance Society. As printers have enough sins of their own to answer for, I think it due to them to mention that this was not a printer's error, but arose in transcribing a shorthand note.

Attention has been called in the Press, and in Parliament, to the horrifying account of the action of the Dum Dum bullet given by a German doctor at the Wiesbaden Congress, on the strength of experiments which he had himself made with the bullets upon dead bodies. How he got the bullets, or the bodies, for the purpose is not explained. He says that the results of his experience were "fearful, and cannot be exaggerated." "Not only are the bones," he says, "but the flesh as well, torn and splintered in all directions. Even the skin at the point of contact shows long seams torn in all directions"; and he thinks that steps should be taken to restrict the use of anything but lead bullets in small-bore rifles.

It so happens that I have just received from the Frontier an eye-witness's account of the effect of the bullet upon five men who were shot on one occasion during the Frontier War. There is no doubt as to their having been Dum Dum bullets, for the reason which will be explained presently. Here is the report:—

No. 1.—Hit in head. Killed, but head not seriously smashed.
No. 2.—Hit in the chest close to heart. Walked with assistance one mile, where doolies were got; was all right in less than one month.
No. 3.—Hit in stomach. Walked part of the way back, but died in the night.
No. 4.—Hit sideways through posterior. Was able to walk afterwards, but apparently the bullet touched his spine, as he has since lost the use of his legs.
No. 5.—A native officer. Hit in the fleshy part of the thigh, bullet only just missing the bone. He doubled back for reinforcements, then walked into camp four miles over very rough ground, and was absolutely well and at duty again in about a fortnight.

This, it is true, does not give very specific information as to the action of the bullet on striking the body, but it seems quite inconsistent with the German medico's statements. The writer, it will be seen, makes no mention of the skin having "long seams torn in all directions at the point of contact," or of the flesh being "torn and splintered in all directions," and such statements are quite inconsistent with the case of No. 2, who was shot close to the heart, and was all right in a month, or No. 5, who was shot in the thigh, and seems to have experienced absolutely no inconvenience from the wound. It rather looks from this as if the effects of the bullet upon the dead body were different from those on the living subject.

I have said there is no doubt as to these being Dum Dum bullet wounds. The reason is singular. They were all wounds inflicted upon British soldiers by British soldiers. An officer with a detachment of six men of the 15th Sikhs was detailed to hold a house on the left flank during the advance on Saran Sar. When the retirement commenced, the Dorset Regiment were ordered to guard that flank, but they were not informed of the presence of the Sikhs in the house. The consequence was that as the detachment cleared out of the house, the Dorsetshire men opened fire on them at about five or six hundred yards, knocking over five out of the six, killing one man on the spot, and inflicting on the others the wounds above mentioned.

The incident is highly creditable to the shooting of the Dorsetshire Regiment, but it confirms the worst that has been said in regard to the slipshod and defective character of the Staff work throughout the campaign. On more than one occasion Gurkha scouts who had been sent out were fired at by our own troops under similar misapprehensions. I contradicted last week the statement that at the taking of the Sanpagha Pass, General Westmacott's Brigade had fired into General Gaselee's, and the officer who sent the contradiction appeared to think that it was a monstrous thing that such a report should be circulated. In regard to the incident above mentioned at Saran Sar, I take the responsibility of saying that there is no doubt whatever about the facts.

After reading Sir Bindon's Blood's despatch on the operations of the Buner Field Force, one can only conclude that the Commanders of the various Frontier forces have been engaged in a competition as to who shall compile the biggest list of officers for honourable mention. This may be an amusing game to the competitors, and highly gratifying to the officers who benefit by it, but the general result is to render "mention in despatches" a distinction devoid of all military value. Sir Bindon Blood's force, as no one will deny, did its work creditably and successfully; but it performed no exploit which has been heard of at home, except by a casual paragraph in the newspapers; its work was completed, as the covering letter of the Adjutant-General in India records, "within twelve days from the commencement of operations"; and the very name of the expedition will be forgotten in twelve months. Yet for this Sir Bindon Blood recommends to the notice of the Commander-in-Chief fifteen officers of the Divisional Staff, four in each of the Brigade Staffs, five on the line of communications, four at the base, sixteen officers of battalions and units, two medical officers, two officers of his personal staff, and three politicals—total, fifty-five names. Should we ever be engaged in a serious war, every soldier in the Army will have been "mentioned" before peace is concluded.

Sir William Lockhart may have been right in his criticism of the field hospital equipment for mountain warfare in India; but it would be well that we should lay the blame upon the right quarter. I believe I am right in saying that although many special committees have sat during the last twenty years for the purpose of reforming military hospital equipment in India, and fitting it to war conditions in that country, and although these committees have had before them the experience of innumerable frontier campaigns, no equipment adapted to mountain warfare has yet been arrived at. The fault here, as in so many other shortcomings brought to light during the recent campaign, seems to rest with the highest Indian military authorities, and with them only.

I continue to receive from India a great deal of correspondence bearing upon the Afridi war, and the articles on the subject that appeared in TRUTH earlier in this year.

No doubt there are many points arising out of the campaign which require to be kept in mind, and which demand further discussion; but as regards the mere details of the fighting, the responsibility for incidents which took place on this, that, or the other occasion, and other matters of that kind, I think we must now regard the book as closed. The war is over, for the time at any rate, and many incidents which were of supreme importance three months ago, when a renewal of the fighting seemed probable, have now become matter for the historian rather than the journalist. I say this by way of apology to numerous correspondents with whose communications I do not now see my way to deal in detail.

An ugly story was told in the Daily Mail last Friday of the public degradation, à la Dreyfus, of a lance-corporal of the 2nd Grenadier Guards. The function took place on the parade ground at Wellington Barracks, in full view of the public in Birdcage-walk, and a considerable crowd assembled to witness the proceedings, the very carriage drive being thronged with spectators in carriages and on horseback. The corporal had been reduced to the ranks by sentence of a court-martial, which had also awarded him fourteen days' imprisonment. It will probably astonish every civilian reader to hear that this sentence was imposed for the simple offence of drunkenness, and the astonishment will not be lessened when the full facts of the case are understood. These I am able to give, as, having had an intimation from the regiment that the case was of some public interest, I sent a representative to watch the proceedings at the court-martial.

The case for the prosecution was that the prisoner, Lance-Corporal Simpson, was drunk in the roadway opposite Buckingham Palace at 11.30 p.m. on April 8. The principal witnesses to that effect were Colour-Sergeant Acreman, who made the charge, and one or two other N.C.O.s who had seen the prisoner outside the barracks, one of them being a lance-corporal on gate duty, who saw the prisoner come in. Acreman, although in company with another sergeant at the time, did not order the prisoner to be escorted to barracks, but went to the sergeant of the guard, and told him to notice Simpson when he came in, and if he was drunk to place him under arrest. The sergeant of the guard (Craddock) looked out for Simpson accordingly, did not consider him drunk, and did not place him under arrest. He gave evidence for the prisoner at the trial, and he also stated that when Simpson came into barracks the lance-corporal at the gate agreed with him (Craddock) that Simpson was not drunk. Other witnesses also testified to the prisoner's sobriety. On learning next morning that Simpson had not been arrested, Colour-Sergeant Acreman reported the matter to the sergeant-major. Simpson was brought before the Commanding Officer, and being confident of his case, claimed a court-martial, with the result above described. It should be mentioned, as a significant circumstance in the case, that Colour-Sergeant Acreman last year brought against Simpson a charge of felony, for which he was tried by court-martial and honourably acquitted.

In the first place, it will be seen that there was here a direct conflict of evidence, upon which any civil court of justice would have given the accused the benefit of the doubt. His right to that benefit is increased by the fact that substantial reason exists for suspecting animus against him on the part of the colour-sergeant, who had originated the charge and was the principal witness. No such principle of justice or equity, however, is recognised by the Court; and not only is the prisoner convicted, but he is sentenced to the exceptional punishment of fourteen days' imprisonment, together with reduction to the ranks and public degradation. Had the C.O. disposed of the case himself the punishment would probably have been a reprimand or a few days' "C.B." Why the difference, when the court-martial passes the sentence? Because it is the practice in the Army for courts-martial to impose extra heavy sentences as a punishment to men who dare to appeal from the C.O.'s jurisdiction, the object being to deter men by this means from so appealing. In other words, an unjust punishment is imposed in order to defeat the rights given to soldiers by Act of Parliament. The whole case is thoroughly discreditable to all concerned, and what object there could have been in advertising all the circumstances before a London crowd in Birdcage Walk, unless it was as a warning to any spectators who might be contemplating enlistment, I fail to perceive.

Have the War Office withdrawn the excellent order removing the designation "Army Pensioner" from the envelopes enclosing pensioners' quarterly payments? I ask in view of two envelopes before me, one of which enclosed the pension, while the other also contained a money-order. Both are inscribed "Army Pensioner," and on one the words are printed. There were the best possible reasons, quite apart from sentiment, for abandoning this practice, and I suspect that this relapse to the old form has occurred without Mr. Brodrick's knowledge.

An American National Guardsman seems to take the field prepared for every emergency. Here are the orders of the Colonel of the Ninth Regiment as to the kit to be provided for war service. I suppose military administrators are much of a muchness in all countries. Anyhow, this insistence on a tooth brush, a whisk brush, and two dozen pocket-handkerchiefs is quite in the style of our War Office:—

> Chiefs of sections will at once notify members of their section that if called out for service they must report at the armory with the least possible delay, and will bring the following articles with them:—One extra pair broad-toed shoes, two extra pairs of socks, one extra suit of underclothes, one extra blue flannel shirt, two dozen handkerchiefs, two towels, one cake of soap, one hair brush and comb, one tooth-brush, one whisk broom or brush.
> Members should also provide themselves with a pair of rubbers and should report with one day's rations. The uniform worn will be campaign hats, leggings and broad-toed shoes.—By order of

Although there has been a vast amount of discussion during the last few months as to the best way of making a military life agreeable to "Tommy Atkins," Tommy himself seems to have been the last man consulted on the point. As he is accustomed to take me into his confidence in a very flattering way, I have been favoured with many hints as to the kind of Army reforms which would be most acceptable to him. Some I fear are impracticable, but not all. For instance, a man writing to me a week or two ago gave it as his opinion that one of the chief objections to military service is the difficulty of getting home on furlough, and he contended that nothing would do more to stimulate recruiting than to give every soldier serving in the United Kingdom the opportunity of visiting his home once a year, at a railway fare sufficiently reduced to be easily within his means.

Unless I am mistaken, sailors when on leave on shore have the privilege of travelling half price. Some time ago certain railway companies agreed to issue return tickets to soldiers at single-journey fares, but I am told that this privilege has been withdrawn, at any rate by some lines. If the territorial system were logically carried out, and every home battalion quartered in its own county, this question would not arise. But as it seems to be the universal rule that every regiment shall be quartered as far as possible from its territorial headquarters, there can be little doubt that the majority of men would appreciate any increased facilities given to them of visiting their homes from time to time.

There is no doubt also that the popularity of the Service would be very much increased if more personal liberty could be given to soldiers, and in the case of men of thoroughly good character, who have qualified as efficient soldiers in every respect, there seems no good reason why this should not be done. For instance, one of my correspondents in the ranks suggests that every trained soldier who has been for a certain period clear of a regimental entry, should be allowed a permanent pass to stop out of barracks after tattoo, when off duty. Another makes similar suggestions with regard to a certain allowance of furlough every year to every man of good character. A third suggestion which I have before me is that sergeant-majors' drills in the afternoon for trained soldiers should be abolished. When a soldier has learnt all his duties thoroughly, and has shown that he is a man who can be trusted to behave himself properly, is there any real reason for keeping him all the year round more or less under lock and key in the barracks?

I put this with some confidence because not long since an officer of considerable experience went so far as to suggest in the columns of the Times that in regard to large numbers of soldiers we might abolish the barrack system altogether, and allow them to live out in their own homes and merely attend barracks at stated hours during the day. There can be no question that in the present day one of the chief objections against military service is the loss of personal liberty, and it is well worth the consideration of the military authorities whether greater liberty might not be given in a large number of cases without the slightest interference with military discipline.

At the same time, there is no doubt that a great deal might be done to make barrack life itself less unattractive. On this point also I have had many suggestions of late. One of the most practical of them is that every regiment should, as a matter of course, have a cricket club, and, where practicable, a boating club also, and that every encouragement should be given to the men to go in for these sports. It is also suggested that a dance club for the winter evenings should be a regular recognised institution. Many regiments have clubs of this kind already, but I fancy they are left too much to the initiative of individual C.O.'s or regimental officers. There is no reason why the regulations should not be as clear and definite on these points as they are in regard to the starting and management of canteens and reading rooms.

While on this subject, here is another suggestion from the ranks. I do not suppose that it is needed in every regiment, but it was no doubt prompted by the personal experience of the writer, and probably his experience is not absolutely unique in the Army:—

> When the orderly officer of the day is going his round at breakfast and dinner, I suggest that he should invariably come into the men's rooms and see for himself that the meals are properly cooked and served, and that the men get their proper quantity. He cannot do this by merely standing at the bottom of the stairs or in the passage and shouting, "Any complaints, there?"

I have no wish to prejudice Lord Lansdowne, Mr. Brodrick, Lord Wolseley, and other exalted functionaries in the criminal proceedings for fraud and conspiracy threatened by a tall, grey-bearded ex-cavalry pensioner in an application at the Westminster Police-court last week; but I certainly think that the case of this veteran calls for further notice, and some explanation on the part of the War Office. The man's own statement is that his pension has been stopped in consequence of a conviction before Sir John Bridge on a charge of being drunk and disorderly. No one will suspect Lord Lansdowne, Lord Wolseley, or any one else of a fraudulent intention to deprive the veteran of his pension, but it looks, on the face of it, as if, whatever the intention, some irregularity had been committed, for under ordinary circumstances I believe a pension is not liable to forfeiture upon such conviction.

Here is an Army grievance which will appeal to the sympathies of Sir John Gorst, who may, perhaps, feel inclined to remonstrate with Lord Lansdowne on the subject. At Warrington Depot the only schools available for the little Tommies and their sisters are two voluntary schools (Church of England and Roman Catholic) over two miles distant from the barracks, and all through the past winter the youngsters have had to tramp this distance and back, regardless of weather. Such a walk is too much for the strength of the smaller children, and is bad for any of them. The children get wet through on their way to school, and have to sit all day in their wet clothes; and it will surprise no one to hear that bad colds and serious sickness have resulted. Of course, if the children are kept at home, the C.O. gets a notification from the school, and the father gets a wigging. This is not the fault of the local military authorities, but of the War Office, who themselves appoint the schools which the children are to attend. If there are no schools nearer, one ought to be started at the Depot, and it would be of benefit to others besides the children, for I hear that the N.C.O.s there have at present very scanty facilities for preparing for educational examinations.

A young man named Enoch Walker was sentenced at Runcorn the other day for stealing a quantity of valuables from actors at the local theatre, and from other parties. Enoch is a Volunteer, and most of the articles were found packed up in his kit. When the sentence was passed, Superintendent O'Kell, according to the report, advised him to enlist. The Superintendent's notions of a desirable recruit for the Regular Army seem to be a little questionable, but possibly he thinks that in the present anxiety to increase our forces, all will be fish that comes into the recruiting-sergeant's net; or possibly that the discipline of a Line regiment would be better calculated to keep Enoch in the path of honesty than that of a Volunteer corps. At the same time, should this martial youth after his release from prison act upon the Superintendent's advice, it would be well that his antecedents should be known in whatever regiment he selects, in order that his comrades in arms may keep an eye on their kits, and on his.

The plans for the new Naval College at Dartmouth have been approved, and the work of building it is to be commenced next month. One of the Service papers points out that no room has been set aside as a library, which seems a decided mistake. It is also surely a blunder to build the College merely upon the basis of the number of cadets which are at present on board the Britannia; for the chances are that additional accommodation will be required in a few years, as the Navy is more likely to expand than to diminish, and then there will be a great waste of public money, which would be avoided if the authorities would now exhibit some little foresight and allow adequate room for growth.

The committee entrusted with the fund raised for the relief of the widows and orphans of the gallant fellows who lost their lives in the Margate surf-boat disaster last December seem bent upon pursuing the policy which has so often brought odium upon the administrators of similar trusts. It appears from the Thanet Times that they have invested the £9,000 subscribed by the public, and the income is to be doled out in allowances of 15s. a week to each widow, with 2s. 6d. for each child under seventeen years of age. These allowances do not err on the side of liberality, but the chief cause of the dissatisfaction that is being expressed is the apprehension that the capital is to be hoarded up until it can be finally diverted to some other object. The Mayor has shown that this fear is not unfounded. "It is quite possible," he says, "that the necessity for relief will disappear long before the capital is exhausted," and in that event "it has been suggested that we should build sailors' homes for the widows of men lost at sea." If anything of the kind is done it will be a scandalous misappropriation of the money. The money was given by the public for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the men who lost their lives in the Margate surf-boat disaster, and it is for that purpose alone that it ought to be applied.

My remarks on the Board of Trade sight-tests have incurred the rebuke of an optician, who insists that no man who cannot see half-inch type at sixteen feet is fit for the mercantile marine. He says:—

> Your assertion that persons who cannot see a half-inch object at sixteen feet can yet see larger objects at a considerable distance perfectly cannot possibly be correct. The eye would be either myopic or hypermetropic, and in both cases distant vision is defective.

I am much obliged to my correspondent for this information. I have been conducting a series of experiments on the subject, and I find that though I have not a man on my staff who can see a short black pin on the carpet at the other end of the room, which is a less distance than sixteen feet, they can all of them see the Clock Tower at Westminster from the door of the Royal Aquarium, which is, of course, "a considerable distance." It seems, therefore, that in this office we are all of us, including myself, either myopic or hypermetropic. I believe, however, that I can see quite as far through a brick wall as most people, and I think that I could distinguish a red or green light at sea at night as well as any officer who has passed the Board of Trade sight-tests.

I am doubly glad to see that the opening of Kew Gardens at 10 o'clock has at last been secured; first, because it is a valuable privilege, not only to residents in the vicinity, but to Londoners at large; and secondly, because it is an encouraging victory over the hide-bound traditions of officialism. There was never any good reason for keeping this most beautiful of our public pleasure-grounds closed till the afternoon, the official excuse that it was necessary for the benefit of the students being mere moonshine.

Within the last week or ten days the refreshment kiosk in Kensington Gardens, which has become such a popular resort during the last two or three years, has been enclosed by iron gates. There are three paths approaching the kiosk, and gates have been placed at the entrance to each. Why? They certainly are not necessary for the protection of the premises against thieves, for anybody can step over the railings, or, for the matter of that, over the gates, and the kiosk is already enclosed in the park railings. The ground thus enclosed is a portion of the Gardens, and the paths on which the gates are placed are public rights of way. Unless it is intended to stop up these rights of way, the gates can only have been placed there for the purpose of giving somebody a job.

Since it is apparently impossible to impress upon those who daily have to handle the various poisons employed in modern manufactures the absolute necessity of precautionary measures, it is satisfactory to learn from the Home Secretary that the services of two eminent scientific experts are being secured to test and report upon the various glazes used in the manufacture of pottery. When the knowledge of the modern chemist is taken into consideration, it certainly seems wonderful that, up to now, no substitute for lead has been discovered, more particularly as this deadly compound is employed in so many industrial preparations, and its effects are so horrible upon the unfortunate workpeople who are compelled to handle it. There is in this direction a splendid opportunity for the philanthropist who will offer a costly prize, either for the discovery of a substitute for lead in the manufacture, or a complete antidote to it, if perforce it must be employed.

The Sabbatarian Parish Council of South Stoke has had another nasty rebuff. Since the failure of their attempt to induce the magistrates to put in force an obsolete Act of Charles I., these egregious fanatics have passed a by-law to prohibit the playing of football, or any other games, on the village recreation ground on a Sunday. Before it could become effective, however, the by-law required the sanction of the Local Government Board, and this sanction has been refused. The Board is of opinion that, so far as any piece of ground awarded to the parish for the purpose of recreation is concerned, such a by-law cannot be made, as it would deprive the villagers, during one day of the week of the use of the ground for the purpose for which it was intended. Such a by-law, it is added, could only apply to unlawful games, among which football and cricket could certainly not be included. This decision is highly creditable to the authorities at Whitehall, and it may be usefully borne in mind in other parishes should any similarly narrow-minded bodies try to suppress healthy and rational methods of Sunday recreation.

The effort to retain the small open space in the City, contiguous to the General Post Office, which has come to be spoken of as "the Postmen's Park," has failed for want of a comparatively insignificant sum. The £12,000 required to buy the land has been collected, and of the £200 a year needed for its maintenance, £125 has been promised; but the want of the last £75 per annum has wrecked the whole scheme—unless the City Parochial Foundation can be induced to grant a small extension of time to enable a further and final appeal to be made to the benevolent. The object is a most deserving one, and could only a few of those in the habit of helping their poorer brethren obtain a glimpse of this spot at the hour of the mid-day meal, the money would be given over and over again. The loss of this bit of garden will be keenly felt by the postmen of St. Martin's-le-Grand, the nurses of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and the large population of teeming Aldersgate-street and Little Britain.

In a recent issue I gave some particulars showing the casual way in which the Post Office treats its customers who rent private telephones. It would seem to be a mistake to employ Post Office telephones at all for communication between private establishments. A gentleman who has a telephone between his two business places at the West End of London, only a few hundred yards apart, tells me that he applied a few years ago to the Post Office for an estimate for telephonic communication between them, and the price quoted was £13 per annum. He then got a tender from a private Telephone Company, who did the same work for 48s. per annum. He adds that the service is perfectly satisfactory, and the attention received from the Company exemplary. Verbum sap.

If the people of Hastings are wise, they will set their faces resolutely against any attempt to saddle the borough with financial liability in connection with the new harbour scheme. I hear from a friend in the town, that such an attempt is now being made, and that it is likely to take the form of asking the Corporation to guarantee the interest on a 3 per cent. loan of £100,000. If the Hastings ratepayers want to saddle themselves for an indefinite period with a payment of £3,000 a year interest, I would recommend them at least to spend the principal on themselves, rather than hand it over to a company for the purpose of being cast into the sea. Little or none of the capital so far raised has been subscribed in Hastings, which shows that the capitalists of Hastings have little faith in the scheme; and if further capital cannot be raised outside the town without a Corporation guarantee, that is a clear proof that capitalists outside Hastings have as little faith as those in the town. The attempt to get the town to guarantee interest where it refuses to subscribe the principal, and when outsiders will not risk the investment, is a piece of very cool impudence.

Common sense is entirely on the side of those, whether inhabitants of Hastings or outsiders, who hesitate to put money into this insane speculation. A harbour can never be a profitable commercial undertaking unless it is built to meet the requirements of an existing and growing trade; and all harbours at small ports like Hastings are worked at a loss, for the sake of indirect benefits rather than for the direct profits from the harbour itself. This may be seen from the experience of more than one South Coast port. To construct a harbour in the mere hope of creating a trade, which there is no solid reason to expect, is the wildest of speculations.

Even if there were any reasonable prospect of converting Hastings into a port with as much trade as Folkestone or Newhaven, the only profit that would be expected would be the indirect benefit to the railway and the town; and in a case like that of Hastings—which is first and foremost a pleasure resort—any indirect profit which might result from its conversion into a trading port would be more than balanced by the direct loss which would result to the town through the diminution of its attractions to visitors. If Manchester has made a bad bargain over the Ship Canal, built by a commercial community to supply an existing want, what good are the ratepayers of a seaside watering-place likely to do for themselves by sinking their money in the construction of a harbour where no trade exists, with the certainty that the capital will never earn a dividend, even if trade comes, and with a strong probability that, if trade comes, it will do the town quite as much harm as good? If the ratepayers of Hastings want to raise a loan of £100,000 for the benefit of the town, I will show them a dozen ways in which they could lay out the money to infinitely better advantage than this.

I hear from Great Yarmouth that a singular incident occurred in connection with the recent election of Guardians in that borough. It is alleged that at the counting of the votes, one particular ballot box was found to contain ninety-nine papers in excess of the number which, according to the presiding officer's return, it ought to have contained; and though some explanation was given, the agent of one of the candidates considered the circumstances so suspicious that he requested the Local Government Board to hold an inquiry. The Board replied that they had nothing to do with such a matter, and apparently it is only by means of an election petition or other legal proceedings that anything can be done. There seems to be an understanding now that the question shall be dropped, but in the public interest it is to be hoped that such a course will not be allowed. A Guardian speaking last week, casually remarked that "there might be scepticism on the part of some people as to how polls were built up." If such scepticism exists, it is all the more necessary that such an allegation as is made in this case should be properly investigated.

A very suggestive remark was made by a member of the Devonport Town Council during a discussion respecting the arrangement under which the Watch Committee arrogates to itself the discretion which the Chief Constable should exercise in regard to the institution of licensing prosecutions. The member in question argued in favour of the arrangement on the ground that while "it was easy for a licensed victualler to make an enemy of one individual, it was not so easy to make enemies of nine out of sixteen." Nine represented a majority of the Watch Committee, and "it required nine enemies to get a prosecution sent to the magistrates." Put the other way about, this means that a publican can secure himself from prosecution by making friends of a majority of the Committee. The Council approved of the system, but I trust the Home Secretary may be induced to use his authority to put an end to it. To permit a body constituted like a Watch Committee to discuss and decide in secret conclave whether an alleged offence against the law shall be followed by a public prosecution is certain to lead to scandals, more especially when it is offences affecting the liquor trade that are so dealt with. In practically every other class of offence, from pitch-and-toss to manslaughter, it rests with the head of the police to say whether a prosecution shall be undertaken, and there is no justification whatever for fettering his hands when it is a licensing offence.

There was a curious case before the Law Courts last week, which resulted in no verdict, owing to the disagreement of the jury. A gentleman had insured his furniture. He sent it to Maple's to be stored, and paid the extra insurance demanded. At Maple's there are a number of storing warehouses. The furniture was placed in warehouse E. But when the insurance company inquired at Maple's in which warehouse it was, the clerk accidently said that it was in warehouse C. But E and C were burnt down, the furniture being burnt in C. The company paid insurance to the owner of the furniture, and then sued Maple's for it, on the ground that although it was burnt in E, Maple's had stated that it was in C. The claim on Maple's seems to my non-legal mind an extraordinary one, indeed, and contrary to common sense. If admitted, it would seem that should a man insure his furniture and state in what room of his house each article is placed, he would lose his insurance if he had moved it from one room to another, and the house and furniture were burnt.

A correspondent puts forward a pertinent suggestion for the Solons who persist in sending people to prison for the so-called crime of sleeping out. It is that their worships should at least satisfy themselves whether there was decent shelter available for the offenders in the local casual ward. For instance, at the last meeting of the Kirbymoorside Guardians it was reported that there were only two beds in the female casual ward, and that, when seven or eight women sought admission, they had either to sleep three or four in a bed, or else one or two had to lie in the bath. It is not to be wondered at that tramps prefer to sleep under a hedge or in a barn rather than in a casual ward overcrowded in this disgraceful way, and to punish them for doing so is simply monstrous. The parties who ought to be punished are the Bumbles who neglect to provide the accommodation which the law requires them to provide for the destitute wayfarer.

The Cambridge Bench gave some strange reasons the other day for the dismissal of a summons against a cabman for driving his vehicle on the wrong side of the road. There does not appear to have been any question that the defendant went on his wrong side in order to pass a cart; and that in consequence he nearly came into collision with a little girl who was riding a bicycle. The Bench dismissed the summons, however, on the grounds (1) that cyclists habitually break the rule of the road themselves; (2) that the rule is not a hard-and-fast one; and (3) that on this occasion no damage was done! It would seem from this nonsense that because some cyclists break the rule, other cyclists are not entitled to its protection; also that drivers of vehicles in Cambridge can go on the wrong side of the road without incurring any penalty so long as no actual injury is caused to anybody. If they have the misfortune to maim or kill somebody, then it will be a different matter, and these worthy magistrates will doubtless reconsider their extraordinary pronouncement. Meanwhile, I should advise their worships to abstain from giving reasons for their decisions. It almost invariably happens that a magistrate's attempt to explain a foolish decision only makes it look more foolish.

A new and original reason for the imprisonment of a would-be suicide was given by Bailie Robertson at Edinburgh Police-court last week, in a case in which a young woman had nearly killed herself by drinking a quantity of laudanum. There was no question that she had suffered severely for her folly, but she had quite recovered, and it was not suggested that it was necessary to keep her in custody for her own safety. In these circumstances the most sensible and humane course would have been to let her go; but the Bailie, sapiently remarking that "the public and the friends of the accused must be protected from being alarmed by such conduct," committed her to gaol for ten days. The cry of "the protection of the public" has served as an excuse for many a harsh and stupid sentence, but never, I should think, for one more harsh and stupid than this.

The Recorder of Lynn must be sorry he spoke at the last Quarter Sessions. There was no prisoner for trial, and the Grand Jury were informed by circular that it would be unnecessary for them to attend. The Recorder, however, vetoed these notices, and summoned the Jury, in order that he might deliver a lecture upon a supposed dereliction of duty by the borough magistrates. It seems that he had jumped to the conclusion, from a newspaper report, that their worships had dealt summarily with a case which ought to have been committed for trial. He accordingly harangued the Grand Jury upon a provision of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879 which directs magistrates to commit for trial any person charged with felony who in consequence of a previous conviction on indictment is liable to be punished with penal servitude; and expressed the hope that, in future, the Bench would do the duty that was laid upon them by the law. It must have been a nasty comedown for the Recorder, after taking all this trouble to set the magistrates right, to have to write a letter acknowledging that, so far as they were concerned, he was himself wrong, the fact being that the previous convictions against the prisoner to whom he referred were summary convictions only, not convictions on indictment. By holding the Court and insisting upon the attendance of the Grand Jury, the learned gentleman merely succeeded, in fact, in putting a number of worthy burgesses to unnecessary inconvenience and making himself ridiculous.

A Draco named Beaumont at Maritzburg has recently sentenced a private in the Royal Dublin Fusiliers to six months' imprisonment and fifteen lashes for shop-breaking. The imprisonment may have been deserved, but there was nothing whatever in the circumstances of the robbery to call for the flogging of the prisoner, and it is amazing to find that a Colonial magistrate has the power to inflict this brutal and degrading punishment in such a case. This Mr. Beaumont appears to have been passing such sentences pretty freely, and a severe dressing down which he received from a Judge of the Natal Supreme Court has failed to cure him of his predilection for the use of the lash. The sooner, therefore, the Natal Government relieves him of the power which he abuses the better it will be for the reputation of the Colony for humanity and justice.

In reference to two cases at Birmingham Police-court, which appeared in my Legal Pillory last week, I am informed that neither Mr. G. Tangye nor Dr. Warden was among the magistrates who adjudicated. The mistake arose from the slovenly practice of the Daily Post in lumping together under one heading the names of the magistrates sitting, and reports of the cases heard in three or four different courts.

Charing Cross Hospital, W.C., entirely dependent on voluntary support, urgently requires help. Liabilities, £11,000. No investments.

Magisterial views as to the relative heinousness of offences against the person and offences against property are again strikingly illustrated in my Legal Pillory this week. At Ashford, one month's imprisonment is deemed a fitting punishment for a man who deliberately runs down and nearly kills a cyclist; at Ayr and at Liverpool petty thefts are visited with sentences of five and six months' hard labour. In this Ashford case, at any rate, it cannot be said that the lightness of the sentence was attributable to the prisoner's good character, for he had twenty-eight previous convictions recorded against him. But as I have often remarked previous convictions do not seem to count in cases of violence and cruelty—a view of the matter which is further borne out by the decision reported from Keighley. Had the defendant at Keighley been guilty of poaching, or larceny, or vagrancy instead of a brutal assault, he would never have been let off with a fine on his fourteenth conviction. Among the remaining items in the following list I would particularly call attention to the example of judicial ferocity at Longford, and to the sentences at Ludlow for thefts of ferrets. The severity with which the defendants at the latter place were treated may possibly be explained by the fact that they were looked upon as potential poachers :—

Blofield Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. E. Gilbert, T. Slipper, G. W. D. Palmer Kerrison, and Major Jarey. George Harris, van driver, charged with working two horses in an unfit condition, and John Stanford, charged with causing them to be so worked. The horses were in poor condition, suffering from wounds, and quite unfit for work. Both fell down exhausted on the road, and one died there. Harris fined 5s. and costs, Stanford £1 and costs.

Warrington County Petty Sessions. Before Mr. G. Comber and Mr. Armitage. John Caldwell, farmer, charged with cruelty to a horse, by causing it to be worked when in an unfit state. The animal was an aged one, very lame, and suffering from a large raw wound, from which blood was oozing, under the collar. Owing to its wretched condition the animal was subsequently destroyed. This was defendant's second offence of the same kind. Fined £2 and costs.

Beith Sheriff Court. John Edmonstone convicted of assaulting his wife, by striking her with a pair of tongs, kicking her on the legs, and beating her with his fists. Fined £3.

Keighley Police-court. Before Messrs. B. S. Brigg and W. Clough. Joseph Heaton, farmer, charged with assaulting Greenwood Holdsworth. The evidence showed that defendant committed an unprovoked and brutal assault. There were thirteen previous convictions against the defendant, who did not appear. Fined £5 and costs, the Bench intimating that it was the last time they would inflict a monetary penalty.

Blofield Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. E. Gilbert, T. Slipper, and G. W. D. Palmer Kerrison. Wm. Lowe and George Fenn, labourers, charged with stealing eight fowls, and Stephen Curl charged with receiving the fowls. Six weeks each.

East Grinstead Police-court. Before Mr. C. H. Everard. John Mansfield, charged with sleeping out. Seven days.

Hartismere Petty Sessions. Before Mr. G. H. Wilson and other magistrates. George Ralfe, an aged man, charged with stealing two hens' eggs from a nest. Fourteen days.

Brierley Hill Police-court. Before the Stipendiary. Charles Round charged with sleeping out. Ten days.

Longford Quarter Sessions. Before County Court Judge Curran. Michael M'Manus convicted of stealing potatoes. Five years' penal servitude.

Ludlow Borough Police-court. Charles Leary, Edward Collier, and Stephen Wainwright, charged with stealing two ferrets from a garden. Six weeks each. At the County Police-court, Collier was also charged in company with George Baynham with stealing another ferret. In this case Baynham was sentenced to six weeks and Collier to three months' hard labour.

Ashford Police-court. Frank Simpson, convicted of an assault on a cyclist. Defendant and two other men chased the cyclist down a steep incline at a rate of seventeen miles an hour, finally running him down, smashing his machine, and badly injuring him. There were twenty-eight previous convictions against defendant for various offences. One month.

Kirkcaldy Police-court. Before Bailie Thomson. James Nugent and John Nugent, charged with assaulting James Smith in a railway carriage. Because Smith refused to play cards with them, the accused violently assaulted him and threatened to throw him out of the window. The Bailie said it was a very serious offence. Fined 20s. each.

Greenock Police-court. James Doherty, convicted of assaulting his wife. He struck her on the face and knocked out two of her teeth. Fined 30s.

Ayr Sheriff-court. Thomas Banister, convicted of stealing a jacket from an hotel. He had been previously convicted. Five months.

Liverpool County Quarter Sessions. Before Sir W. Forwood and other magistrates. Charles Chester, charged with stealing 15 lb. of beef. Six months.

Tenterden Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. J. Ellis Macc and J. Hay Edwards. Five boys, between 12 and 13 years of age, charged with stealing fourteen fowls' eggs. Fined in amounts ranging from £1 1s. including costs, to 11s. including costs, the total penalties being £3 15s.

Rugeley Petty Sessions. Before Sir Charles Forster and other magistrates. Elijah Dorie, charged with stealing twenty-seven eggs. Fined £1 and £1 7s. costs, or fourteen days.

A conviction of exceedingly questionable justice was recorded at the Dover County Petty Sessions last week against Mrs. Wells, the wife of a market-gardener. The prisoner was charged with stealing part of a broken hurdle, value threepence. The witnesses for the prosecution were a policeman and a labourer, who asserted that at twelve o'clock at night they saw Mrs. Wells leave her house, climb up a bank on the other side of the road, take part of a hurdle and bring it down and place it on the footpath. Both men were standing some little distance away, and it was a dark night. The defence was that Mrs. Wells—a perfectly respectable woman—was anxious about the return of her husband, who had been expected home earlier from a drive, and that, on going up the bank the better to see whether he was coming, the piece of hurdle became entangled in her dress, and she disentangled it and dropped it down on the path. The husband came up in his trap just after she was arrested, and it was proved that her skirt was torn and that a piece of braid was found on the bank. It further transpired that, instead of waiting to obtain a summons, the policeman insisted upon taking the prisoner the same night to the police station, four miles away—a most unnecessary and unwarrantable proceeding in such a case.

In view of the conflict of evidence, the position and character of the prisoner, and the extreme improbability of such a woman going out at midnight to commit so paltry a theft, one would have expected the charge to be dismissed. But the magistrates, Major R. B. Lawes and Mr. W. H. Burch Rosher, convicted Mrs. Wells and fined her £2. "Property," said these jolterheads, "must be protected." So sacred in their eyes is the cause of property—property in the form of a piece of wood valued at threepence—that it overrides the principle of giving the prisoner the benefit of the doubt, to say nothing of any consideration of mercy—assuming that she was really guilty—towards a first offender.

Some months ago reference was made in TRUTH to the practice which certain Chancery Taxing Masters, one of them in particular, had adopted of giving themselves extra holidays, long beyond the very ample allowance provided by the legal vacations. Subsequently, I had the gratification of learning that this hint had had the desired effect. It is to be feared, however, that the effect is now wearing off, for one of these functionaries took upon himself to begin his Easter holidays on April 2, five days before the commencement of the vacation, and he had not returned to his duties on Friday last—four days after the vacation had ended. It seems that these officials have no chief to look after them, the idea apparently being that, as they are so generously treated in the matter of holidays, they can be trusted as a matter of honour to be at their posts during the time for which they are paid. This idea is evidently fallacious, and they should, therefore, be treated on the footing of schoolboys who will play truant if they see the chance.

It has long been one of the tricks of the Spanish hidden-treasure swindler to represent himself as a victim of the insurrection in Cuba, and just now he seems to think that this tale will be particularly appropriate and effective. In some of the latest letters that I have seen he drops the explanation that the money came into his possession as treasurer of an insurrectionary fund, and merely mentions that he has a sum of £72,000—not buried, as usual, "in your neighbourhood," but deposited in "a great foreign bank." There is the customary rigmarole about the seizure of the prisoner's luggage for debt, and the customary request for the payment of the "necessary expense" for the redemption of a trunk containing, in a secret receptacle, an order on the bank for the payment of the £72,000. "As amends" to the friend who will recover the trunk and get the cash from the bank, the generous prisoner promises a third of his fortune of £72,000. And there are simpletons who swallow the story and remit the "necessary expense" to Barcelona!

By the way, some of the "prisoners"—there are, of course, several gangs engaged in working this venerable swindle—appear to be using a very much out-of-date London directory. One of their letters was sent the other day to a gentleman at a City address which he left twenty years ago.

From a communication just received I gather that a trick for unloading shoddy cloths and dress materials, against which I have often warned my lady readers, is still in active operation. As it seems that many are still in the dark about it, it may be as well to describe the modus operandi again. The game is opened by the delivery of a circular with reference to a bankrupt sale of goods, in the name of some firm at Manchester or elsewhere in the North. The circular is accompanied by samples of the very choicest materials in such lines as cambric handkerchiefs, damask table-napkins, linen towelling, glass-cloths, &c., all offered at phenomenally cheap prices. Then follow one or two individuals to take orders for the goods as per sample. If an order is booked, the traveller next announces that he has with him a length of black silk, or some other tempting dress material, which he is prepared to sell on the spot, and as the price is equally tempting, he frequently succeeds in disposing of a quantity for cash. The dress material is worthless rubbish, only made to sell, and the other choice goods, which have been ordered by sample, are, of course, never delivered. Recent circulars issued for this purpose bear the names of "W. G. Gant & Co., Manchester," and "M. G. Lewis, Glasgow." Of course, no such firms exist, and letters addressed to them come back through the Dead Letter Office.

Sir George Lewis wrote to the Times last week to make known the fact that "James W. Ryland" and "Robert Dean" are "aliases of that money-lending rascal Isaac Gordon." This will be no news to readers of Truth; but it has occurred to me that it might be useful and interesting at the present moment to print a fuller list of the names and addresses used by this most active and ubiquitous of bloodsuckers. In an action at Birmingham County Court on Friday he admitted that he "traded"—it is his word, not mine, for such vampirism—in thirteen different names, not one of them being his own, and if the truth were known I dare say this number would be increased. Gordon is such a quick change artist that it is almost impossible to say how many different disguises he assumes; and I do not pretend that the following is anything like a complete record. He has, however, employed all these names and addresses within a comparatively recent period:—

James W. Ryland, 6, Livery-street, Birmingham.
B. Edwards, ,, ,,
Edwards & Co. ,, ,,
Wm. Wallis, 66, Great Russell-street, London, W.C.
George J. Addison, 3, Holles-street, London, W.
Arthur A. Andrews, 6, High-street, Kingsland, London, N.
Robert Dean, 99, Withington-grove, Whalley Range, Manchester.
James Williamson, 44, Park-row, Bristol.
Henry Cookson, 518, Edge-lane, Liverpool.
Wm. Spencer, 1, Wellington-buildings, South, 2, Litherland-avenue, South Castle-street, Liverpool.
Thomas G. Allen, 34, Reservoir-street, Leeds.

In addition to the above, Gordon is also closely concerned in the usury shops run by a former manager of his named Levin in Ireland. Here are some of the names and addresses used in connection with these establishments:—

Henry Staples, 4, Nassau-street, Dublin.
James Cameron, 73, Harcourt-street, Dublin.
Arthur Graham, 3, Hume-street, Dublin.
A. Stevenson, 70, Woodhouse-street, Dublin.
A. Lucas, 124, Donegal-street, Belfast.
James Gardner, 51, South Mall, Cork.
W. Bennett, 2, Laurel Hill-avenue, Limerick.

It may be added that, in some instances, Gordon borrows the name and address of his clerk or agent, instead of adopting entirely fictitious ones.

In the course of a year, Gordon must spend a considerable sum in printing and posting circulars, and in newspaper advertising—for there are some newspapers, I am sorry to say, which, though his character is well known to them, still continue to hire out their columns to this disreputable scoundrel. Judging from the quantity of the circulars that are forwarded on to this office, much of his expenditure in that direction must be thrown away; and he doubtless gets a good many replies like the following, which was addressed to him a few days ago by a recipient of an offer of a loan from "Robert Dean":—

> I have sent your disgusting circular to the Editor of Truth. I hope he will castigate you literally as heartily as I should like to do bodily.

Still, notwithstanding these repeated rebuffs and incessant exposures, Gordon finds plenty of dupes, and I suppose he will continue to do so until the law is altered to pare the claws of such birds of prey. This is sufficiently proved by the number of actions in which he figures every week, for it is probably within the mark to say that for one case which goes into court there are fifty in which his miserable victims are squeezed dry without the aid of the law.

One debtor at the London Bankruptcy Court last week attributed his failure directly to the extortion to which he had been subjected by Gordon. He had borrowed first from "Edwards & Co.," and then, with a view to getting out of the clutches of that firm, he borrowed from "Robert Dean," only to find that both the lenders were in reality the many-aliased Gordon. In the case at Birmingham, which I have already mentioned, Gordon lent a clergyman £30, and received back in one year £30 for interest on this sum. He has now sued the parson for another £40, and Judge Whitehorne, whilst condemning the terms as extortionate in the highest degree, has given judgment in his favour. This Judge would do well to take a leaf from the book of some of his colleagues in dealing with Gordon. In yet another case last week, the Edmonton County Court Judge refused to come to the usurer's assistance in enforcing a judgment summons, though Isaac had not in that instance got back all that he had lost. It was, his Honour observed, one of Mr. Gordon's unfortunate cases, and some of the good ones must be balanced against it—a very sensible view of the matter.

Three documents that have reached me from Southampton are of special interest while the question of money-lending is to the fore. No. 1 is an income-tax notice signed "Herbert B. Röhss, assessor of income-tax," who gives as his address Anglesea-terrace, Bevois-hill, Southampton. No. 2 is the following advertisement in a local paper:—

MONEY.

Do you want money?—If so, refuse to do business with any person who will not quote the rate of interest, or who demands exorbitant fees, but apply personally, or by letter, to Mr. H. B. Rohss, auctioneer and estate agent, 1, Anglesea-terrace, Bevois-hill, Southampton.

No. 3 is a report from the Hampshire Advertiser of February 9, of a case in which a Mr. J. E. Simmonds was charged with obtaining a cheque from the said H. B. Röhss by false pretences. It appeared in that case that Röhss traded as "The Southampton Loan Advance Company," which usually charged interest at about 27 per cent. The alleged "false pretences" were the statements made by Mr. Simmonds at the time of obtaining a loan from the prosecutor; and the jury stopped the case after hearing Röhss cross-examined. I should have thought it a strange thing at the best of times to have an advertising money-lender of this calibre acting as assessor of taxes for his district; but it is doubly strange at the present juncture. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue might well be interrogated on the subject.

I have received a letter from Mr. J. Harrison Brown, of 25, Bedford-row, W.C., in reference to a money-lending case which was dealt with in TRUTH a fortnight ago. Mr. Brown enters at some length into various minor details of the transaction; but the only points which seem to call for notice are (1) his denial that he accepted any instalment after it came to his knowledge that the goods included in the bill of sale had been removed, and (2) his statement that the goods were removed from the borrower's house, not to another house, but to a depository. The latter is a correction of a mistake which does not materially affect the case. As to the first point, I find that there is some conflict of evidence respecting the period at which Mr. Brown became aware of the removal of the goods, and I willingly give him the benefit of his denial. It does not strike me as being of much benefit to him, however, inasmuch as it simply shows that he determined from the very first to stand upon his rights under the bill of sale. Nor does the rest of his letter place any better complexion upon the affair. It leaves untouched the fact that four months after he had made an advance of £30 upon a bill of sale, and when he had already received back £7 10s. in instalments, this Bedford-row usurer still claimed that £37 3s. 7d. was due to him.

Here is a choice example of the unconscionable extortion that is practised by the usurer Jonas Wolfe, who styles himself James Wilton, and carries on his nefarious game at 215, Piccadilly. A correspondent received from Wolfe an advance of £60, of which sum he had to pay £20 to the tout to whom he was indebted for his introduction to the ravenous monster. In return for the £60 the borrower signed a promissory note for the payment back of £100 in five monthly instalments of £20 each; and Wolfe was also given as security two new five-guinea revolvers, a £45 Express rifle, and a quantity of mounted lion and panther skins. I hope the law will soon make such a bargain invalid, though at the same time I must add that I have very little sympathy with a simpleton who allows himself to be fleeced in this way. The borrower, in this instance, would have done far better for himself at a pawnshop.

At one London vicarage last week no fewer than four circulars addressed to past and present curates of the parish were received from J. Notley, of Rosedale House, Zetland-road, Redland, Bristol. This rascal poses as a philanthropic capitalist, full of sympathy for a profession whose incomes are "altogether inadequate to meet the many calls made upon them," and anxious to help impoverished clerics with an advance at "a very reasonable rate of interest." Notley's assumption of this character is, I hardly need say, a mere trick of the trade, the truth being that he is only a tout for a Bristol usurer named Abraham Lazarus.

Mr. Harlequin Smith's idea of devoting to charity the money offered to the soft-headed competitors for his prizes has been adopted by the individual styling himself the "Zuilia Perfumery Company." This impudent dodger has just announced that as 30,000 people have purchased his goods in hopes of getting a prize, and as it is impossible to divide the £50 offered into 30,000 parts, he has handed the money over to the Lifeboat Institution; but any applicant who prefers to have his share paid over can do so on forwarding a stamped envelope, i.e., by paying twopence to receive a farthing. These rascals seem to think that they can safely laugh at their victims to their faces, and I dare say they are right.

There is a pestilent quack trading as the "Rev. David Jones," or under other names, at Brighton and Lewes, whose advertisements I have repeatedly warned country newspapers against publishing. I am indebted to the Editor of the Aldershot News for an interesting piece of information as to the way in which these advertisements are foisted upon the Press. Jones, it seems, sends them round in the name of "Hawkins & Co., Advertisement Contractors," Kemp Town, Brighton, "Hawkins" being, in point of fact, one of his own aliases. Each offer of an advertisement is accompanied by a cheque in payment of thirteen insertions. The Editor of the Aldershot News states that, although he has repeatedly returned the advertisements and the cheques, they still arrive regularly once a quarter. Jones evidently trusts that the presentation of a cheque with the order will sooner or later have the desired result, or else that if he keeps on persistently enough, his advertisement may get smuggled in by accident. It might tend to stop Jones-Hawkins's little game if newspapers thus favoured were to refuse to return his cheques, which, of course, they are under no obligation to do, unless he forwards a stamped envelope for the purpose.

The free portrait trick is evidently flourishing in France. There is a new practitioner in this line in business at Bordeaux—one Desqueyroux, who calls himself Director of the "Association Artistique Bordelaise pour la réproduction de Portraits." Whether this is our old friend Tanquerey, or his former colleague, Schneider, under a new name, I do not know; but his modus operandi appears to be identical. Considering how smartly our police got rid of the free portrait gang in this country, it is evident that they do not order this matter better in France.

At last I have received, through the kindness of an Australian reader, some authentic information respecting the origin and development of the great Griffen snowball which has been rolling round the world for the last few years. It seems that the originator of this enterprise is a Miss Griffen, residing at a place called Mills-street, Carlton, Hurstville, a suburban district about nine miles from Sydney. The institution for the benefit of which the chain letter purports to have been started is the cottage hospital of St. George's District, in the same suburb. The new wing, on behalf of which the appeal in the letter is made, has been erected since the collection began, and a contribution towards it, the exact amount not being known, has been made by Miss Griffen. Notwithstanding the manner in which the lady's name and address have been mangled and transformed in the various reduplications of the chain letter, letters have been arriving at her address for years past, from every part of the inhabited globe, in incalculable quantities, the local letter-carriers sometimes delivering half-a-bushel at a time. At the commencement of the undertaking, Miss Griffen kept a small school for young children. She has long since given that up, and her whole time appears to be devoted, with the help of a paid assistant, to opening and sorting the letters and postage stamps which pour in upon her. It is stated that she has one room entirely devoted to the stamps taken from the letters, which are packed in big pillow-cases.

The case seems to be parallel to the similar one in the United States which attracted attention two or three years ago, and it is an equally striking monument of the folly of the people who assist in carrying on these insane collections. In view of the manner in which the address has been altered in the course of repetition—"U.S.A." having been substituted on many letters for "N.S.W."—it is quite certain that vast quantities of letters containing postage stamps sent off in answer to Miss Griffen's appeal have found their way into the dead letter offices of various countries. On the other hand, it is equally certain from the facts stated above that stamps to the number of millions must have reached this lady. Seeing that they come from all parts of Europe and America, as well as from India, China, Japan, and other remote countries, it may be safely assumed that among them are many stamps of considerable value, and the total collection which Miss Griffen has amassed must represent a very substantial sum of money.

Knowing nothing of this lady personally, it is not for me to make any imputation upon her bona-fides. No doubt she is duly accounting to the hospital for all the money she is receiving. My informant states that the hospital authorities have countenanced the appeal, and have benefited out of the proceeds. If it be true, however, that Miss Griffen was at the beginning of the undertaking earning her living in a small way by keeping a school, and that she has given this up in order to devote her time to the snowball-collection, it is to be presumed that the hospital authorities allow her some remuneration for her trouble, as well as for any assistance that she receives. If that is so, the hospital managers are absolutely responsible for the whole thing, and ought to issue to the public a proper account of the result of the collection, showing how much money has been realised, and how it has been spent. Apparently they have never thought of doing so down to the present moment.

About this time last year, when Diamond Jubilee advertising was the order of the day, I published the announcement of an enterprising dentist in the Edgware-road, Mr. V. C. Mallan, who was anxious to celebrate the occasion by presenting sixty necessitous old ladies with sets of teeth. The old ladies, needless to say, were soon forthcoming, and Mr. Mallan has now sent me a photograph showing the sixty patients before and after treatment. A more startling proof of the difference which the presence or absence of teeth makes in the human countenance, I have never seen. Among my acquaintance I number not a few ladies who own to having false teeth. Judging by this dentist's advertisement, every one of these ladies must be from ten to twenty years older than I had previously supposed her.

I am indebted to a gentleman in the waste-paper line of business for an explanation of the packing of gold leaf in the pages of Holy Writ, about which a question was recently asked in TRUTH. It seems that "Bible waste" is an article well known in the waste-paper trade, and that there is a large supply of it. The reason for this I take to be, partly that the Bibles are printed in enormous quantities, and partly because, owing to the special care taken to have the printing perfect, more than the usual proportion of sheets are rejected on account of imperfections in the printing. My informant states that Bible waste is sold in large quantities from the University Presses, and that it used to be in great demand among butchers, but is now chiefly used by the gold-leaf trade.

The seed thus dropped by the wayside is, I am told, believed in some cases to have fallen upon good ground, and to have sprung up and borne fruit. If the mere handling of the Scriptures in the course of business has such a good effect, those who print and sell Bibles should be better men than the generality of printers and booksellers. Whether experience proves this to be so, I do not know. I have always heard, however, that we have an exceptionally virtuous and intelligent class of men engaged in printing and publishing TRUTH.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer made the usual allusions in his Budget speech to the private correspondents who communicate plans for disposing of a Budget surplus. I have not a few correspondents of the same kind. One of them, a sympathetic lady, wrote to me from the country to suggest that some portion of the surplus should be devoted to superannuating National-school mistresses. The school teacher who gets past her work is such a genuine object for compassion that I cannot refuse to pass on this suggestion to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach for him to think over between now and next April. At the same time, there are other people who require superannuating besides school-mistresses. Among others I would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that some portion of his next surplus might well be devoted to the relief of deserving journalists.

Who would not be a governess? Look at the following noble offer made to educated ladies through the Irish Times:—

> Governess (Daily) wanted; English, rudimental French, music; one child; £2 per quarter.—D. W. E., &c.

The annual meeting of the Dundee Conservative Association was held last week, and a glowing speech was delivered by the enthusiastic chairman, who gave a roseate account of the party prospects in this constituency. The treasurer, however, had a grievously different tale to tell, for he reported the Association to be hopelessly in debt, and it was decided to endeavour to extricate it from a quagmire of difficulties by means of that last resort of respectable cadgers, a bazaar. The income aimed at to keep the Association on a sound financial basis is only £200 a year, which does not seem a large sum for the wealthy Tories of Dundee to provide, but they must know that the party prospects are absolutely hopeless in this constituency, and that they might just as well shovel their money into the Tay as waste it in supporting a Tory Association, which, of course, exists only for the benefit of its paid officials.

The China Blue-book clearly explains what has been going on in the Far East, and the course of action of Lord Salisbury in regard to these matters. The Premier regarded the possession by Russia of an ice-free terminus to the Siberian Railway, and its extension through Manchuria to the terminus, as legitimate. But he objected to Port Arthur as well as Ta-lien-wan being leased to Russia, because the former could be converted into a naval arsenal, which, he contended, would give to Russia in the Gulf of Pechili the same strategic advantage in regard to China as she already possesses by land.

Russia declined to renounce her contemplated lease of Port Arthur. Her contention was that all other great maritime Powers had a naval basis in Chinese waters; that of these Powers England alone objected to the lease; and that, as Port Arthur commands Ta-lien-wan, the latter without the former would be held by her at the good pleasure of any other maritime Power. Russia having thus acquired Ta-lien-wan and Port Arthur, Lord Salisbury secured to us Wei-hai-wei as "compensation," on precisely the same terms.

There has been a good deal of discussion as to the conditions under which foreign ships will have a right to the use of Ta-lien-wan and Port Arthur. The outcome is that Ta-lien-wan is to be an open port—i.e., all goods may be imported to it, and through it, under the same tariff as exists in the Chinese Treaty ports, and that all foreign ships may use Port Arthur under precisely the same conditions as they did before it was leased to Russia.

With the exception of the lease of Wei-hai-wei, there is no great fault to find with Lord Salisbury's diplomacy. Although we might have preferred that Russia should not have obtained a lease of Port Arthur, it would have been madness on our part to engage in a war to hinder it, unsupported, as we should have been, by any other Power. Wei-hai-wei has been secured as a "compensation." It is a sop that Lord Salisbury had to throw to his Jingo supporters. I do not suppose that we shall fortify it, and, if not, the lease will simply mean that no other Power will be able to do so. I should have thought, however, that the better course would be to obtain an assurance from China that it should be leased to no one, for this would have been more in accordance with our policy of commercial rather than territorial expansion in China.

Manchuria, which is outside the area of China proper, is now admittedly under Russian influence. This is in accordance with the logic of geography, and if she civilises the country we shall commercially gain more than if it had been left uncivilised under the nominal rule of Chinese Mandarins. Corea, I suppose we may assume, is to be within the sphere of Japan. All China proper is to remain a free-trade preserve. Our interests are, therefore, in no way damnified.

AN APPROPRIATE ENDING FOR THE SURPLUS.

"It seems that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was at first undecided as to whether his proposed remission of taxation should benefit the tea drinkers or the smokers. After due consideration, however, he unhesitatingly decided that the tobacco duty should be reduced."—Daily Paper.

Of course, 'tis Tobacco Sir Michael selected,
His choice is the one we might all have expected;
Of course, 'tis Tobacco—'tis easy to see
Why that suits the Government better than Tea.
Of course, 'tis Tobacco on which they intend
The far larger part of their surplus to spend;
For thus (by a sly and a cynical stroke)
Their promised remission ends only in smoke!

Ends only in smoke! Come, you'll surely admit
That there could be no possible ending more fit.
For the things that our Ministers boldly essay
As a rule always end in a similar way.
Since first by the polls into office conveyed,
Professions and promises freely they've made,
But if their performances you would invoke,
You will find every promise has ended in smoke!

Where, where are their measures which want were to cure?
Where the pensions they promised the provident poor?
Where, where the new markets our trade was to gain?
Where the projects that swarmed in a Chamberlain's brain?
The widespread content we were soon to survey?
The new panaceas—oh! where, where are they?
For three years we have been 'neath the Unionists' yoke,
But their high-sounding schemes have all ended in smoke!

And their very big talk both to Turkey and Greece—
Did that serve to keep these two nations at peace?
Their fussy complaints and their purposeless threats,
Which Russia despises, but never forgets;
Their words of defiance, which nobody heeds,
Well knowing they never support them with deeds;
No wonder derision they tend to provoke,
For their threats, like their promises, all end in smoke.

The omen's a good one; for though still elate,
The Government boast a majority great.
Though they still on the votes of their slaves can depend,
However they blunder, however offend,
Yet this for its comfort the country may know—
As their millions have gone, so will Ministers go.
That majority vast they at present invoke—
That also will end, like their surplus, in smoke!

SCRUTATOR.

THE PRICE OF A CUBA.

I HAVE been entirely with President McKinley in this Americo-Spanish quarrel. The Spaniards have misgoverned Cuba, and there has been one long series of outbreaks against this misgovernment. The present Civil War has lasted for four years, and unquestionably under General Weyler the greatest atrocities against the "rebels" were of common occurrence. But after the recall of this General, an honest attempt seems to have been made by Spain to settle the relations between the Mother Country and the Island, on the basis of autonomy being secured to the latter. President McKinley's aim was only to interfere so far as would have secured to the Cubans this self government. But Congress, backed up by a wave of Jingoism, insisted upon Spain granting independence to Cuba, and, in the resolutions that it passed, it appears to have gone out of its way to render it impossible for Spain, even if she had been willing, to grant independence. As matters stand, it is desirable that the United States should achieve a decisive victory, for victorious she must be in the end, and the shorter the war, the better for all concerned. Cuba has proved a mine of wealth to the Spanish officials sent there, but a most expensive possession to Spain. By losing it, she will be the gainer, and the Cubans will be better off without her than with her.

I have never yet understood why any nation should deem it essential to its pride and happiness to have Colonies. I rejoice in being born an Englishman, but my pride in being so is not dependent upon England being possessed of territory outside the British Isles. This, I know, is contrary to the trend of public opinion just now, but it is nevertheless the true conception of patriotism. Were it not so, a Swiss or any other inhabitant of an independent, but self-contained, country could not be as much of a patriot as an Englishman.

The question of Colonial extension is to me merely one of business. Take India: I think that we are the gainers on the balance by possessing India, and the Indians themselves are not averse to our rule. Therefore, I should hold to India, but at the same time I should endeavour to make Indians rather our co-citizens than our subjects. Take Canada, or Australia: I am by no means clear that their possession adds to our strength. But they govern themselves, and the relation between us and them is rather in the nature of an alliance than that of Suzerain and subject. If ever they wish to leave us, I should not hinder them. So long as they wish to remain with us, I should not show them the door. But, were I a Canadian or an Australian, I should, I think, be inclined to decline to recognise any sort of British supremacy, and I should insist upon absolute equality as a condition of union. Take Africa: I should hold fast to a fortified coaling station at the Cape. The Cape Colony and Natal might—as in the case of Canada and Australia—remain with us, or withdraw from us, as they please; but I should not attempt to add to the Empire vast tracts of land inhabited by negroes, whether such tracts be called Uganda, Sokoto, Rhodesia, or the Soudan, for the plain and simple reason that the markets that we may acquire by such annexations are, on the balance, not worth the expenditure and responsibilities that we incur by securing them. These views may appear strange to the Jingo of to-day; but they are those which were entertained by every British statesman from the close of the Napoleonic wars to within the last few years. Concentration was, in their opinion, more essential than expansion for the well-being of a State, and, as Sir Robert Peel said, if we ever do extend the area of Empire, it ought only to be by the annexation of countries where English Colonists can live and thrive. Our present doctrine of perpetual expansion must in the end bring us into collision with other countries. As it is, all the world worth owning has a civilised owner. Already, we can only expand by laying hold of what is not worth grabbing. We have already pretty well reached the limit of even these worthless regions, so that we shall have soon to extend at the expense of civilised nations if we are to go on extending.

As for universal philanthropy, I am no believer in it. If a nation that is misgoverned seeks to throw off the yoke, it has my benevolent sympathy, but that sympathy does not go to the extent of spending British money or British blood in aiding the insurgents. The business of an English statesman begins and ends with seeking to make Englishmen prosperous. As an Englishman, I would rather advance the well-being of Englishmen at home whose lot might be bettered, than waste British resources in civilising Uganda or any other such place; all the more as these endeavours usually are more productive of harm than of good.

What has been the outcome of this new policy? We are now spending more on armaments, exclusive of the Indian Budget, than any of the great military Powers of the Continent. Our own expenditure is about 44 millions per annum, that of India 20 millions, whilst the total expenditure of Germany on Army and Navy is about 30 millions. We have laid it down that we must have a fleet strong enough to be paramount on the high seas; and in pursuit of this aim we build war ships. Other Powers, too, build war ships, with the result that, although they and we have both built ships, their relative strength and ours remains very much as it was before this beggar-my-neighbour expenditure commenced. But, not content with the dominion of the seas, our policy of adventure in parts of Africa far from the seaboard makes it necessary that we should augment our land forces. This too, therefore, we have done. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech compared the number of square miles in the Empire with that of other Empires, in order to prove that our Empire costs less to defend than any other per square mile. Nothing could be more misleading. The area of Empire is one thing: the area of taxation another. It is the British taxpayer that has to pay for defending the former. The Chancellor then estimated the number of the inhabitants of our Empire against that of other Empires, to show that we pay less per head for armaments than others. But he included in this estimate Colonials who pay nothing, and Africans who can pay nothing.

We are, for the nonce, very prosperous. But this prosperity is somewhat artificial. Our exports, notwithstanding all this talk about acquiring new markets, have gone down. In past times we were a saving nation, and there is no industry more remunerative than economy. Our savings we invested in foreign loans, &c., and we still receive a good deal of interest from these loans. We continue to make large profits, but the individual Englishman, like the English collectively, has ceased to be economical. What he gains he, in great part, spends.

I am no believer in a country looking to its Government to force its manufactures on the outer world. Such a system saps all that individual energy and resource without which no nation can compete successfully. Still less do I believe in it when the system involves a war expenditure in peace times. The commercial education of England is far behind that of Germany. The Germans are more pushing, and more intelligently pushing, than we are, in selling the goods that we and they manufacture, and they are more careful to adapt the form of their goods to what pleases customers. They beat us in the field of commercial enterprise, and they will continue to do this until we recognise that commercial education, individual push and intelligence, are more potent factors in the prosperity of a manufacturing nation, than building battleships and annexing comparatively worthless territories. It is all very well for allied aristocrats and plutocrats to seek to divert attention from the democratic reforms that they dread at home by a wild and costly policy of adventure abroad. This is always how the advance of democracy has been met by its opponents. Until Radicals realise that it is far more important that the lot of the workers should be bettered at home, than that our resources should be fooled away in enlarging the area of Empire abroad, the democratic road will remain blocked, and that wretched sham Tory democracy will flourish. Tory democracy means that the classes are to rule, and that the masses are to rest and be thankful, so long as a few million negroes are added each year to the races that are subject to us.

MR. RHODES ASKING FOR MORE.

Mr. Rhodes has not increased his reputation by his speech last week at the meeting of the Chartered Company. After having had the honour to converse with him during the proceedings of the South Africa Committee last year, I came to the conclusion that he was little more than a Buffalo Bill so far as politics are concerned. At first I thought, when he professed ignorance of all details, that the ignorance was affected, but I soon found that it was real. I make no doubt that he has a wild, hazy ambition to annex all Africa, and I should say that, if ever he succeeded in this dream, his next step would be to make himself President or Emperor of this African Empire. There is a good deal more of the Boulanger about him than the Washington. I should have had more sympathy with him had he spent his own money on his political aspirations instead of using his professions of patriotism to acquire a huge fortune for himself. This, it has always been our boast, British statesmen have never done. After Mr. Rhodes' speech of last week I think that most persons will agree with me in my estimate of him, for wilder trash never was uttered.

The speech is differently reported in almost every newspaper, which leads me to suppose that the reporters were unable to make head or tail of a good deal that he said. If the Times report is to be taken as correct, he appears to contemplate an amicable race in railway making, at the cost of the British taxpayer, between himself and the British authorities in the Soudan. Each is to push forward until there is a railway from the Cape to Alexandria. The British Government is to provide him at once with the means (three millions I think is his present demand) to push the railroad forward beyond the Zambesi into Northern Rhodesia. This territory, he says, is mineralised, and the shareholders of the Company, if this be correct, would benefit by this railroad being made. He adduced, however, no real evidence to show that there is paying gold there. On Rhodesia south of the Zambesi he was vague but grandiloquent. He was certain that there is vast mineral wealth there, but whether this be the case or not, the shareholders have only to give him a free hand in order to get an excellent dividend on their investments, although many have bought their shares at a premium of 1,000 per cent. Credat Judæus, non ego, although it seems to me that as most of the cosmopolitan financiers of Oriental origin connected with the Company have taken very good care already to sell their shares, and to privilege others to enjoy this dividend of the future, they share my scepticism. The Company, it would seem, has spent six millions. Mr. Rhodes proposes that, as a condition of the settlers being granted self-government, they are to take over this amount, leaving the Company with its land and mining rights. The greater portion of this expenditure is due to the native outbreak, which was caused, according to Sir Richard Martin, by the attempt to force them to work, and by the police having been withdrawn in order that they might be used to raid a neighbouring State. Be this, however, as it may, the land and mining rights were granted to the Company in consideration of their assuming all costs of opening out and administering the country; and the settlers are hardly likely to consent to leave the Company in possession of all land and mines, and to take upon themselves the burden that has been incurred in obtaining them. But whether they take over this outlay or not is a matter of very little practical importance, for unless the mines do prove a paying industry, the entire country will be as little able to pay interest on £6,000,000 as the island of Skye.

The position of things in regard to Rhodesia in its commercial aspect, seems to be this. There was a notion that in Rhodesia gold would be found in such quantities that those possessed of the mining rights would derive vast profits. The owners of these mining rights turned themselves into a Company, and secured a Royal Charter. They sold the greater number of the shares of which they became possessed at various premiums, to those who believed in this notion, and the Company has made a certain amount of money by selling town lots and mining claims to meet current expenditure. Success depended upon paying gold being discovered. It has not been discovered. At present the resources of the Company are exhausted. More money is required in order to keep the bubble going. Therefore, Mr. Rhodes falls back on wild and sanguine prognostications. If really the country proves a Klondike, the shares will possibly be worth their par value, or even more. But this, although humanly possible, is improbable. Assuming that paying gold will not be found, then everything goes by the board. There is land elsewhere better fitted for agricultural settlers, and if there are not a vast number of agricultural settlers, obviously town lots will not be saleable. The country will be inhabited by the natives and by sparse Boer farmers, who will just manage to make a living by squatting on large tracts of pastoral land. After a more or less brief period, the duration of which will depend upon the credulity of investors, the Company will be unable to meet costs of administration, and will disappear. Then we shall have to contribute to the costs of some sort of rough-and-ready administration. Thus the financiers will have made money out of investors, but they will be the only gainers.

The Times the other day pointed out that investors in shares will obtain a return for their shares in the conviction that their money has been patriotically spent. I doubt whether many of them bought shares at nearly 1,000 per cent. premium from any motive beyond the perfect legitimate one of getting a good monetary return. But whether they did or not, patriotism is one thing and the Company is another. Mr. Rhodes boasted that he and the shareholders had vastly increased the area of Empire. Neither he nor they have done this. South of the Zambesi the entire territory was brought by proclamation within the area of British influence long before Mr. Rhodes and his financial friends acquired a mining concession from Lobengula, and killed him to square accounts with him. North of the Zambesi, what is now called Northern Rhodesia, was within the area of British influence, when commercial rights belonged to the Lakes Company, and before this latter Company was absorbed by the Chartered Company. Had Mr. Rhodes and the Chartered Company not existed, the whole of Rhodesia would have been, as it now is, within the area of British influence, and neither Germany nor any other Power would have dreamt of disputing our claim to it. It is well that this should be understood. The Company was simply a speculative venture of certain persons, and if a speculation is to be judged by results, to its promoters it has been a fortunate one, for they have made a good deal of money by it. If it is to be judged by results to the investing public, it has not been a fortunate one, nor is it likely to prove so, for they have lost money by it, and will, according to all reasonable probability, lose whatever has not already been lost. My objections have been based on the Government having played into the hands of the promoters by indirectly implying, by the grant of a charter, that the speculation was a sound one to investors, and not interfering when the shares of the Chartered Company were converted into mere gambling counters. Otherwise I should not have troubled myself about the matter any more than about any other speculative mining Company. A share in a mining company is much like a lottery ticket. Sometimes it turns up a prize, generally it does not; and if a man likes to take one of these lottery tickets, it is his affair, not mine, whether it prove a prize or a blank.

THE LORDS AND THEIR LIBRARIAN.

In the Palace of Westminster the room of the House of Lords is better than their company. The distribution of space in the building is under the control of the Lord Great Chamberlain, an hereditary courtier. Commons and Lords each have a library, although there seems no sufficient reason why one library should not be used by both. The Lords have a Librarian, and this Librarian had for long a vast number of rooms, which were termed his house. In 1889 a Committee recommended that the salary of any future Librarian should be £800, and that the official residence should be continued to him on the express understanding that he should surrender it, if it were required at any time for the extension of the library, or for any other purpose, in which case his salary was to be £1,000 per annum. The post being vacant in 1897, Mr. Strong was appointed Librarian, and on April 23 of that year, he received the Lord Great Chamberlain's warrant of occupation of the Librarian's house. The house was then examined by the Board of Works, and it would seem that it was found that £600 would be necessary in order to paper and clean it, &c. Mr. Strong betook himself to the Board of Works with a view to having this sum expended, but the interview, he complains in a letter to Mr. Graham, the Clerk of the Parliaments, was "by no means satisfactory." On this, Mr. Graham called on the Chief Commissioner of the Board of Works to put it in repair. The reply was that the matter would be referred to the Treasury. Mr. Graham on this wrote to the Treasury. Mr. Hanbury replied that the Treasury hesitated to ask Parliament to vote a not inconsiderable sum of money, in order to prepare for residential occupation a part of the building which may shortly be required for public uses, and urged the advisability of giving Mr. Strong the extra £200 per annum in lieu of the house, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of 1889. The Chief Commissioner of Works also wrote suggesting that certain Peers' Committee rooms should be handed over to the Commons, and that certain rooms in the Librarian's house should be converted into Peers' Committee rooms. Mr. Graham replied that it was impossible for the Lords to entertain the scheme, either wholly or in part, and that, after this explanation, their Lordships trusted that there would be no further delay in preparing the house for the reception of the Librarian, by doing such cleaning, papering, painting, and repairs as may be required on a transfer of occupation from one tenant to another.

The matter, therefore, stands thus: the Librarian is getting his £200 as compensation for the house. The house remains empty because the Lords will not agree to the proposal of the Treasury and the Board of Works, which would give the Commons rooms that they require in the Palace of Westminster for public uses, and would convert the house into Peers' Committee rooms. This state of things is a public scandal. The country pays the extra £200 per annum without any equivalent. The Peers, not content with blocking the way of legislative reform, have blocked the way to making the Palace of Westminster serviceable to the requirements of Parliament. The matter was under discussion last Friday, and the debate on the motion that the Librarian's salary be reduced from £1,000 to £800 has been adjourned. Technically, the proposed reduction is opposed by the Government, but, practically, it is moved and supported on the ground that the Treasury and the Chief Commissioner are in the right, and that the Lords are in the wrong. It is to be hoped that Conservatives and Liberals will alike rally to the defence of the House of Commons, and to the proposal of the Treasury and the Chief Commissioner in regard to the apportionment of space between the two Houses. The Librarian himself will not be damnified. He would—having the warrant of occupation of the Lord Great Chamberlain—be able to occupy the house; but it would not be papered and cleaned. If, however, his predecessor could live in it without this new outlay, so can he. As it is, the country is done out of £200 without any equivalent, owing to the obstructive tactics of the Lords. To the Chief Commissioner and to the Treasury, for their determined attitude in this dispute, thanks are due, and they ought to be supported.

A CO-OPERATIVE LIBEL ACTION.

The motives and objects of plaintiffs in libel actions are a curious study. My knowledge of the subject is extensive and peculiar. But when I try to understand why the Co-operative Union, Limited, and thirteen individual members of the United Board of the Union co-operated in an attack upon me before a Manchester Special Jury last week, I confess myself baffled.

The criticism which pierced the thin skin of this formidable array of plaintiffs, or stirred their appetite for the fruits of litigation, was contained in a harmless enough paragraph, in which I referred to a recent appointment of an official by the "Administrative Board" of the Union. This appointment, as I said, had been advertised, and out of forty candidates who came forward six were selected to appear before the Board. The paragraph continued in these words—"Two of these, as I am given to understand, were actually members of the Board itself, and one of these two was the successful candidate." I further said that "another allegation which deserves an answer is to the effect that, although the salary offered was nominally £150 a year, the Board proposed to immediately raise it to something like £200." On these two allegations, I made certain mild comments, which led the Co-operative Union in general and its United Board in particular to claim heavy compensation for an aspersion on their collective and individual characters.

The eloquent counsel employed by the plaintiffs declared, in accents of solemn indignation, that my statement that two of the selected candidates were members of the Board itself was "totally and absolutely false." But when the facts were gently elicited from the incorruptible officials of the Union in cross-examination, it appeared not only that the two candidates referred to were both members of the General Board of the Union, which consists of seventy members, but that one of them was actually a member of the United Board itself, the body charged with all appointments of officials of the Union, including the appointment in question, though naturally he took no part in the meetings while the appointment was pending. Further, the second of the two candidates, the successful candidate himself, had also very recently been a member of this same United Board, and had taken part in the meetings at which it had been determined to make the appointment in question, and at which the salary had been discussed. In view of these facts it appears to me that to describe my statement as "totally and absolutely false" denotes considerable hardihood on the part of those who instructed Sir Edward Clarke.

Other curious circumstances leaked out in the course of the cross-examination of the plaintiffs' witnesses. It appears that just before the examination of the six selected candidates by the United Board, two of the six, and two only, joined the examining Board in the sociable relaxation of "high tea." Oddly enough, these two were the past and present members of the Board, who thus renewed and confirmed their friendly relations with their old comrades. Then, again, the successful candidate himself admitted that he had left his previous position on the ground of serious ill-health. Surely all this, as my leading counsel, Mr. Shee, observed, gives a new meaning to the word "co-operation." At any rate, do not such circumstances call for inquiry and explanation, and justify some adverse comment? Is a public body which dispenses its patronage in this queer fashion quite in a position to make a fiery demand for reparation, and to follow up the demand post haste with a writ?

The question of the salary is a minor matter. I gathered from the answers of the Secretary of the Union in court that a successful man, enjoying the confidence of his old friends on the United Board, is not unlikely to find his salary presently raised beyond the £150 with which he sets out. And the gentleman appointed expressed a confident hope (which I share) that he would soon deserve and secure an increase. But, under the circumstances, it was impossible to prove any definite proposal by the Board to raise the salary immediately, and it is fair to assume that it was this technical failure of proof which induced the jury to give the plaintiffs their verdict for nominal damages.

Now I return to my original difficulty. Why did the Co-operative Union, in face of all these equivocal circumstances, make this ridiculous claim for damages? Why did the thirteen individual co-operators join in the action after it was started, and submit their reputations to this perilous test? Why, above all, did the plaintiffs bring the leader of the English Bar, Sir Edward Clarke, to Manchester to fight this trumpery case? I am credibly informed that a gentleman of Sir Edward Clarke's eminent position, that of ex-Law-Officer, is debarred by professional etiquette from appearing on circuit without a special retaining fee of 300 guineas, besides a further substantial fee "on the brief." That Sir Edward's services are cheap at that figure I do not question. That he earned his money well on this occasion all present at the trial will testify. He said some very nasty things about me; but, knowing the price which his clients paid for them, and entertaining a sincere regard for Sir Edward personally, I feel rather gratified than otherwise at being the humble instrument of his obtaining a fat brief. On the last occasion when I was in a law court, Sir Edward represented me, and I can well understand what a pang it cost him to have to go down to Manchester and say nasty things about me to a Lancashire jury. But he sacrificed himself nobly, as a lawyer does, at the call of professional duty, and with such an example before me, I am certainly not going to make any fuss about my own feelings. Without, however, questioning that Sir Edward Clarke was worthy of his hire, or complaining of his efforts on behalf of his clients, I should rather like to know on what ground the Co-operative plaintiffs felt themselves justified in paying 400 guineas for the services of one barrister. Under no circumstances could the unsuccessful defendant have been compelled to pay more than an insignificant portion of that amount—indeed, I understand that it would have been contrary to the usual practice even to enter a special fee like that paid to Sir Edward Clarke upon the bill of costs sent in for taxation. The thirteen plaintiffs were hardly men in a position to treat themselves to a forensic luxury of this kind at their own expense—even on co-operative principles. On the other hand, it seems rather a large order on the part of the management to commit a concern like the Co-operative Union to such an expenditure over a matter which in no way whatever affected the interests of the members, and which was essentially a private and personal affair of the individual defendants. Under these circumstances I am curious to know whether my friend Sir Edward Clarke's fees are to be paid by the thirteen members of the Board, or by the Co-operative Union. In the latter alternative, it is a matter which ought to have the attention of the auditors or shareholders when the next accounts are presented. I presume that Sir Edward was really retained in the expectation that his talents would secure a verdict for a substantial sum in favour of the plaintiffs. In that case, the thirteen individual plaintiffs would have received in hard cash the proceeds of Sir Edward's labours. That speculation was signally disappointed. Manchester jurymen—as I find, not for the first time—are a very level-headed and discriminating class of men, and in this case they estimated the collective damage done to the whole Co-operative Union by my remarks at 40s., and that of the individual Board-men at 20s. ahead. If these individuals would have shared the profit had the retention of Sir Edward Clarke yielded a substantial return on the investment, they are of course bound to share the loss when the speculation has proved a failure. No doubt they will recognise this, but it may be as well to put the matter clearly, in case there should be any misunderstanding.

I am no enemy to co-operation or to the Co-operative Union. Far from it. I hope that the movement will continue to flourish, and that its leaders will enjoy in the future as they have done in the past the bracing influence of fair criticism, and that they will carefully avoid even the semblance of conduct that shrinks from the light of day. And I bear no malice against the enterprising thirteen who have won a Pyrrhic victory against me. I fear that their pockets will suffer, if the costs are divided upon the equitable principle above indicated; but they may each of them take it from me that the experience which they have bought is well worth the price.

OUR MOCK MILITIA.

In support of my contention that the Government have blundered grievously in omitting the Auxiliary Forces from their Army programme, I gave the other day a striking example of the attitude of the War Office towards the Volunteers. Let us look now at one or two notable facts in regard to that even more important arm of the Service—the Militia. The annual Return of the Militia establishments for last year was issued a few weeks ago. From it one learns that the total Militia establishment of all ranks and all arms for England, Scotland, and Ireland was 133,502—not a very imposing total. But this is merely the strength of the Force on paper. The next column of the Return informs the reader that there were 18,914 of all ranks "wanting to complete the establishment," which reduces the total to 114,588. Out of these it further appears that 7,931 were "absent without leave" from the last annual training, and to include such men in the effective strength of the Force would clearly be delusive. We thus come down to 106,657. There were also absent from last year's training with leave 7,183, who can hardly be safely reckoned as effective at the present date; at any rate the fact is certain that the total number of men trained last year was only 99,474. We thus arrive at the astonishing result that at last year's training the Militia fell (in round numbers) 34,000, or close upon 25 per cent., short of its nominal establishment, 15,000 of these being absent with or without leave, while the remaining 19,000 had never been enlisted at all.

There is another important fact which has to be borne in mind in calculating the exact numerical value of the Militia. The above figures include the Militia Reserve, which, in the event of war, would at once be called up to fill the Line Battalions. The Militia Reserve numbered last year 31,049. After these men had been called up there would be left out of the 99,000 and odd men who trained last year only 68,425, in other words barely one-half the nominal strength of the establishment. Nor does that adequately convey the whole truth. I believe I am right in saying that the Militia Reserve comprises practically the whole of the Militia N.C.O.s—as distinguished from the Permanent Staff—as well as the pick of the men in the ranks. Without any non-commissioned officers but the handful of men on the Permanent Staff (many of them veterans of little use in active service), it is impossible to look upon the 68,000 men left as a force capable of taking the field independently for any purpose. This remnant can only be treated as a Reserve on which the Line regiments can draw to fill up their depleted ranks. Thus, little by little the whole establishment of 138,000 of all arms and all ranks—on paper a fully organised army—is whittled down to an item of the most insignificant proportions in our military system. For this Force, we paid last year, under the heading "Pay, &c.," alone £553,000.

In August and September last the efficiency of the Militia, as regards the personnel of the officers and rank and file, was discussed at some length in TRUTH. The discussion began with an uncompromising onslaught upon the Force by an officer of the Regular Army, and it ended with some very convincing testimony to the excellent physique, discipline, and training of the Militia generally by more than one officer who had gone to the Militia from the Line, as well as from experienced and trustworthy men on the Permanent Staff. The conclusion I arrived at was that although the officering of the Force leaves much to be desired, and the Permanent Staff may not be fully equal to the requirements of active service, the Militia (especially the Northern regiments) contains plenty of excellent material, and is on the whole as efficient as a mere auxiliary force can be expected to be. But if that conclusion be correct, it only strengthens the indictment conveyed by the figures cited above. When you have got a force capable of playing so important a part in our system of national defence, and involving so small a charge to the taxpayer, what excuse can there be for leaving it about 27,000 short of its proper strength, and making no effort whatever to fill up the deficiency? So far from acquiescing in this state of things, as the War Office has done, it seems to me that every effort should be made, not merely to keep up, but actually to enlarge, the present authorised establishment. Common sense suggests that the money of the taxpayer could be spent to far more advantage in this direction, and in improving the officering of the Force, than in multiplying Line battalions, and straining every nerve in the fatuous attempt to keep on our shores two Army Corps ready to invade the Continent (and find their graves there) at a moment's notice. As a taxpayer, I should uncommonly like to know whether the Commander-in-Chief, or the Secretary of State for War, or any other magnate in Whitehall or Pall Mall has ever attempted to investigate the reason why the Militia fell just on 19,000 short of its nominal strength last year; and why, out of the number enrolled, nearly 8,000 were absent from training without leave. These results are not due to some disease affecting the whole Force. A very cursory inspection of the Return will show that both the deficiency in strength and the percentage of absences from training, vary immensely in different regiments, even in the same parts of England. You will find several corps, artillery, engineer, and infantry, either full up, or less than a dozen men short of their complete establishment; while, in other cases, the numbers deficient run up to the three, four, and five hundred in one battalion. A C.O. of my acquaintance, whose regiment is practically up, to its full strength, tells me that he applied for permission to enlist supernumeraries beyond the limit at present allowed, well knowing that he could get the men; but permission was refused, notwithstanding the deficiency of 19,000 in the total strength of the Force. This is the sort of thing that makes one despair of the War Office. Has it ever occurred to the wise men at headquarters to inquire of Militia officers who could give information why in a single county one regiment is able, year after year, to enlist up to its full strength, while another is dozens, or hundreds, short of its establishment? Surely this is a matter worth some inquiry before enthusiastic ignoramuses are encouraged to agitate, as they were agitating a few months ago, for the Militia Ballot to be put in force. Lord Wolseley, speaking only about three weeks ago at the annual meeting of the Militia Rifle Association, informed his audience that in the event of war one of the first steps would be to call out the Militia, and send them to reinforce the principal foreign stations throughout the world. Had he, when he talked of this, the slightest conception of the bearing of the figures given above, or of the fact that by the time the Militia Reserve is called up to join the Line, there will be virtually no non-commissioned officers left but the men of the Permanent Staff? Have Lord Wolseley and those about him ever seriously discussed the organisation of the Militia with experienced Militia officers who know its shortcomings and requirements? Here you have an organisation which has proved in practice its ability to produce a hundred thousand disciplined soldiers of the best possible quality, at a cost to the country of about £5 per head per annum for all ranks, and which, with a little study and intelligence, might be made a perfect instrument for the defence of the country. But not an effort is made to remedy its shortcomings, to improve its organisation, or to develop its capabilities, though year after year millions sterling are added to the cost of our Regular Army. The moral of it is that there is no hope that the taxpayer will ever get value for his money in military material, or ever reduce the present burden of military expenditure, until a root-and-branch reform has been carried out at the War Office.

THE NEW CARTON.

"Lord and Lady Algy" is capital fun. While most people have praised the piece, other voices are heard tearful and querulous because its author has not pursued his usual vein, because he is not sentimental here as becomes a good Dickensite. Mr. Carton has plenty of time to continue in that vogue. He has done good work in it, and will again, no doubt. But he is at liberty to make experiments. Before he wrote "Liberty Hall," he was part author of "The Pointsman" and "The Great Pink Pearl." He has served his apprenticeship to some purpose, he has acquired the playwright's "finger." I am glad, for one, that he has turned aside for a moment down a by-way of Sheridan and laughter.

Lord and Lady Algy were pleasant, foolish people. They liked one another, but not one another's taste in cigarettes; and they agreed to separate. Do not raise your eyebrows! Those cigarettes, perhaps, were symbolical. The pair had smoked themselves out of ready money: I suspect, too, that Lord Algy rather resented his wife's superiority. They seemed, at least, an incompatible pair. Lady Algy went to her aunt's, while her lord remained in their flat with his own cigarettes and the joint cook and butler. There he had visitors—a dun occasionally, his elder brother the Marquis, his father the Duke of Droneborough, and even, at times, his wife. They all arrived on Thursday morning—the dun and the Markiss first and together. The Markiss offered to sign cheques and get rid of the dun. Lord Algy's relief was tempered by his intuition. What, he asked, did his brother want? The Markiss (who was, in fact, Joseph Surface) wanted something quite unbecoming in a fat M.P. of character. He proposed that a married lady should meet him at his brother's flat at luncheon that very day. Here was her photograph, from which he might recognise her. Lord Algy agreed. He did not know that the lady was Mrs. Brabazon Tudway, the wife of a bone-boiler, and his friend; he did not divine that his father, the Duke, his wife, and Mr. Tudway would all visit him that morning. But, of course, they did. Tudway came to ask Lord Algy's good offices with his wife. She was insensible to Tudway's merits; would Algy come to her fancy ball the next night and reason with her? Then Tudway's eye fell on the photograph which the Markiss had left behind him. It was his wife's, and Tudway departed raving. Then the lady came, and Lady Algy came, and the Duke came, and the Markiss came again; and the lady, and the photograph, all went down to Lord Algernon Charles Surface's account. His proud spirit bent. It was his duty next night to go to Tudway's ball and take his jockey, who must be kept from drinking before a race next day. But he supplemented his part, which was that of Marlborough, with the disguise of drink, and leant on the arm of his jockey, who embodied the Young Pretender. Dreadful things happened to the Duke and the Young Pretender—dreadful things, most ingeniously contrived. The Duke turned up unbidden, Tudway turned up unexpected, and, crushing even to a sober man, the lady whom he had come to lecture on the duties of a Mrs. Tudway turned out to be the unknown fair who had assignated in his flat that day. The complications which ensued might have overturned the brain of Isaac Newton. Lord Algy's consultations with Mrs. Tudway were misconstrued by the Duke, his father, and by Tudway, his host. They denounced him in accordance with their several theories of good manners. The Duke privily rebuked him with comparisons, to the advantage of the Markiss; Mr. Tudway ordered him out of the house in the presence of his astonished guests. Fortunately, Lady Algy was on the spot. She had witnessed the loves of the Markiss and Madam Tudway. Algy was ignominiously expelled; but the admirable woman stepped forward and supported her intoxicated spouse to the nearest cab-stand.

Next night came more meetings in the flat. It was the screen scene from "The School for Scandal," with Mrs. Tudway for the little French milliner; but Lady Algy pulled them all through. The curtain fell on an elopement frustrated, on Mr. Tudway, his wife, and the Markiss departing in an unholy trinity, and on Lord and Lady Algy reconciled to a common flat and the same brand of cigarettes. It is an extremely neat little piece. The drama is the art of preparation, and Mr. Carton is a surprising adept in that art. Some of it is farcical—Mr. Eric Lewis's Marquis, for example. But for the most of the piece "light comedy" was the word. Miss Compton as Lady Algy is as good as only Miss Compton can be in such a part. Mr. Ford's Jockey is good enough to ride in the colours of Miss Lottie Venn. Mr. Kemble humorously presents a venerable nobleman ducally unhumorous. The whole team, in short, are good. As for Mr. Hawtrey's Algy, let Lady Algy keep an eye on him. We have known him ere this for an unexampled liar, and now his drunkenness is irresistible. Mr. Spurgeon would have said that Mr. Hawtrey is on the "down grade." Others will rejoice with the statesman who was glad that the reign of earnestness was over. The comic queen rules at the Comedy Theatre.

"THE MASTER" AT THE GLOBE.

Over the return of Miss Kate Terry to the stage, of which she was so memorable an ornament, I refuse to pipe my eye. It is a subject for congratulations, not for long faces. I shall be told by profound thinkers that Miss Terry is the last rose of summer, that all her blooming companions are faded and gone. The point to remember is that Miss Terry is still with us, and still charming. "Nothing is here for tears." If the names of those who have fallen out in the long interval is legion, so much the worse. But like the late Mr. Disraeli, I, too, am on the side of the angels. I entertain the harmless faith that, from their celestial stalls and boxes, they look down on the Globe and are delighted. Even the youngest of mortal critics find that they have had something to learn. They discuss the theatre with their parents with diminished hauteur. I know one of them, who was hardly restrained from leaping on the stage to usurp the place of Mr. Gillmore.

It is true that Miss Terry appears in a bad play. Mr. Hare's virtues are justly familiar. His range as an actor may be limited, but within that range I do not know his equal. This does not mean, unhappily, that Mr. Hare is a good judge of a play. I fear that "The Master" is a miscalculation. If Miss Terry and Mr. Hare are both delightful, it is because they are master and mistress in a kingdom of which Mr. Stuart Ogilvy has not acquired his share.

What was the matter with the Master? He was rich, he had the best of wives, a delightful daughter, a fine fellow of a son. But a little Latin is a dangerous thing. He got it into his head that the Patria Potestas was the rule of life, that a man should be Cæsar in his own house. His son wanting to be a soldier was forthwith cast out. His daughter preferring an honest man to an obvious knave, his nephew, the Master disinherited her. His wife, being summoned to her daughter's sick bed, was forbidden to return. Consequently, the Master had gout and lost his money, speculating. As his wife had £100,000 in her own right, he very kindly forgave and permitted her to to return. His daughter, and even his son, by this time a V.C., were also pardoned. I think the Master had turned a trifle mad. How otherwise can we account for such a person having made money? Possibly his was a case of atheroma, that mysterious disease about which Dr. Lauder Brunton prelects. Quite early in the day his symptoms pointed to it. He told some very stiff stories of blockade running. Of course I know that suppressed gout can do some funny things with the brain. That bandaged foot may mean that Mr. Hare has got off this time. But otherwise I believe that Miss Terry and the rest of his delightful family ought to see an Alienist about him! It is atheroma or insanity.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

LYSIANE.

WIDOWS of a certain age who long to make fools of themselves will find encouragement in seeing "Lysiane." This drama in four acts is a mild one. We walk in green pastures and beside still waters. There is little in it all beyond literary cleverness and Sarah Bernhardt. Sarah as Lysiane de la Lauraye is a rich widow in the St. Martin's summer of her charms. Rare for a stage-mother, she has a grown-up and married son, Marcel. She has also a globe-trotter friend who gives good advice, Sylvain Brière, who might be at her feet were he not devoted to yachting.

Lysiane is, and has ever been, a grande amoureuse. Love makes the world go round. Without love where should we all be? To love is the first duty of a woman. If love is blind, he is covered with feelers. He does not see, but he divines. Woman's love is perspicuity itself. If the beloved one is a scamp, depend upon it he has redeeming qualities. At the point where the play begins, Lysiane is enamoured of a certain Emilien Gautier, a brilliant but most shady adventurer. Marcel cannot bring himself to step between his mother and the object of her passion. But he begs of Brière, who has just returned from a tour round the world, to inform her of his infamous life. Brière does not like to play the informer's part. However, he lets himself be persuaded.

We now come to the ball at Lysiane's villa. She runs from her crowded salons to a romantic terrace, to be alone for a few moments with Gautier. In this happy solitude she promises soon to legalise the tie binding her to him. Enter Brière, who is introduced to the futur as Lysiane's most valued friend. Brière, time running on, thinks the opportunity must be taken to unmask Gautier. He begins by showing up Gautier's confederate Rordin, a turfite up to every racecourse trick. The storm rises, and Brière then threatens to expose the confederates unless Gautier leaves Paris. A scene ensues, in which the latter bids farewell to Lysiane. She fancies he is forced by some woman to break with her, and melts into tears. Silvain, in another act, opens her eyes; but she refuses to see. Love has power to absolve. The son is married to a woman whom he worships. She has no other child. Surely, then, she has a right to marry Gautier. He may seem unworthy. But her heart declares his essential worthiness. Has he not that greatest gift, the power to win love?

Brière has no course now open but to declare himself captivated by Lysiane. He does so, and with a manly honesty that almost subjugates her. She accepts an invitation to make a short tour in his yacht, with Marcel and his wife. Of course she yields to the prayers of the old friend and of her children. The love of an honest man has its charms. A letter of dismissal is sent to Gautier. We anticipate the wedding, but do not see it. The bridal of a grandmother would not be interesting on the stage. Yet I wonder that Sarah Bernhardt, who can face everything, did not come forward as a bride with two generations of posterity round her.

The Queen of the Netherlands is seemingly vouée au vert. In leaving Paris she was in a tailor-made costume of Vert Nil cloth, with a flat skirt and a jacket quite unadorned, except by two rows of big stitching. The revers and waistcoat were in moire of the same tone. Her capote bonnet was of crinkled-up silk and Vert Nil. The trimming was a pair of wings, one white and the other black. The former was boldly, not to say aggressively conspicuous. The black one (being black) seemed trying to hide itself. There is no more unobtrusive colour, taken by itself, than black, unless white, when also alone. But black and white do make such a staring combination. A Queen who resembles the princess of a fairy tale has no need for feathers or light-green frocks when travelling. The eighteen-years' rosy freshness and blond hair could only be set off by, say, a tailor-made dark blue dress and yachting hat. She dresses herself now as she dressed her dolls four or five years ago The Parisians remarked that she is fond of being always in Sunday clothes. This is natural enough at a quiet town like the Hague, where the only places for the display of pretty dresses are the public promenades. The youthful queen had a veil of white tulle drawn over her face. The Regent's toilette was simple—a corsage of black silk, a prune-coloured cloth skirt, a black jet bonnet and a thick veil The French Government, which was most attentive to the young Queen, and treated her as a pretty darling, told off a young Naval officer to accompany them to Cannes. A Princess of Waldeck-Pyrmont had joined their Majesties at the Continental, and accompanied them to Nice. This aunt of Wilhelmina shares the duties of chaperonship with Queen Emma. A charming trait of impatience marked the departure. Wilhelmina, the moment she entered the Royal train (it is her own train), hastily let down the windows to be able to bow the more freely to the sympathising throng on the platform.

The dress worn at the Elysée was pearl grey under tulle, covered with embroidered flowers, and a white hat and feather. The toilette was enriched by a necklace of a single row of very fine pearls. There were some brooches and clasps of large black pearls, to which the grey satin gave value. Gloves, white kid No bracelet.

What a change this must seem to all who remember the late King of the Netherlands and his two sons! There was no society journal during the Empire. If there had been, what a stock of anecdotes one might gather from it about the King and his heir! The former was constantly in Paris, and the latter hardly ever left it. Waiters and cabmen called him "Monsigneur" to his face, and "Citron" behind his back. He died of inflammation of the lungs, caught in returning to his garni from a bal de l'Opéra. It might be said of him that he had no enemy but himself, though his manner was more gruff than amiable. Prince Alexander, who inherited on Citron's death the title of Prince of Orange, hardly ever came to Paris. He passed through it, when given up by the doctors, to sun himself on the Riviera. Alexander was a colourless person, and had hair like tow. The Dutch liked and esteemed him. He was studious and conscientious, and wrote well.

The Queen is grammatically a King: she is Wilielmus IV. It may sweeten the remembrance of her visit to Paris to know that the soldier Jannin owes his life to it. He was to have been discharged from military service in a few days and married, when some old comrades took him to a wine-shop. On returning to barracks he had an altercation with a sergeant, whom he struck. The court-martial that tried him passed a capital sentence. M. Faure, in his anxiety to stand well with the officer class, refused to exercise the right to pardon or commute. But when the papers appealed to him as if speaking for the Queen of the Netherlands, his good nature took effect. How refuse a pardon asked for in her sweet name? Jannin has been saved from the firing party, and the horrid coup de grâce, but he is in for eight years.

I have known in my time a good many Spanish statesmen. Castelar, Sagasta, and Zorrilla were agreed on one point. It was that Cuba was a cause of permanent impoverishment to Spain. But how let it go with honour, each and all asked. It was as good as a rich gold mine to restless and corrupt Spaniards, who could bother the Government. Such men were got rid of by giving them posts in Cuba, where they could make fortunes. The Ministers who gave these posts not unfrequently drew the salaries. Spaniards despised Cubans. I recollect some beautiful Cubans coming to live in Paris, because looked down on at Madrid, in spite of loveliness, wealth, and good education. The Empress Eugénie rather cold-shouldered them. Serrano might have made himself a king, had not his wife been a Cuban. The Queen Regent was in too ticklish a situation to look well into any grievance. A foreigner and a born Archduchess, she had to be wary, reserved, and to avoid making enemies, no matter where. She was ignorant of human nature, unless as it flourishes at Courts. Though personally attached to Sagasta, she was too conservative in feeling not to favour Canovas del Castillo, who left her in the Cuban mess. She has often longed for a Gladstone since Canovas was assassinated. The Regent has good sense; but all she could do was to bring up her children carefully, save fortunes for them, and restore the dignity of the throne. She wore her widow's weeds becomingly. Though wanting in good looks, she presented a stately appearance in a pageant. Her Stockmar—a German doctor, too—was kept out of sight. He was sent with her to Spain, and left there by the Archduchess Elizabeth. The Madrid doctors protested, and King Alphonso XII. wanted to send him back to Vienna, but the Queen stood out and gained her point. The unexpected death of Mercedes was her excuse and justification. She has some enemies. One was a favourite of the late King, the mother of two sons. Her favour began in the lifetime of Mercedes, and only ended with that of Alphonso. She lives abroad. The other foes are members of the Royal Family.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE Duke of Cambridge, dear Lady Betty, dined on Wednesday last at the Mansion House, and, after dinner, in the course of a speech, he made the following remarks:—"We live in an age when everybody appears to think that change is beneficial. I am a very old man—perhaps the oldest in the room—and I do not hesitate to tell the people of this country that this love of change will be their ruin if they persist in it."

This is a very unfair charge to make against our generation. During the last half-century liberal legislation, the developments due to scientific discoveries, the improvements in mechanism, and the enormous increase in the wealth of the world have entirely changed the conditions of life, and have, therefore, rendered it necessary for those who live amidst altogether new surroundings to adapt themselves to the altered circumstances. Time after time it has been declared in these columns that the Duke of Cambridge is half a century behind the age, and that he does not recognise that circumstances are stronger than combinations; and time after time the Duke, when speaking in public, has denied the correctness of these criticisms. However, now, in an unguarded moment, he has revealed his secret sentiments, and the truth of the criticisms is made manifest.

This generation has, through the force of circumstances absolutely beyond its control, outgrown the last remnants of its mediæval clothing; just as a child, in the course of time, outgrows the last remnants of its nursery clothing. The present generation does not believe in the doctrine of the Divine right of kings; it does not believe that Royalty can do no wrong; it does not believe that one class is created to rule whilst the other classes are created to obey; and it does not believe that a few thousand fortunate people are destined from the beginning to enjoy privileges whilst millions of others are destined to suffer wrongs. Inequalities there must ever be: one man will be handsomer than another, or will be cleverer, or will be stronger. One woman will be more beautiful than another, or will be more fascinating, or will be more graceful. These are the natural inequalities which cannot be altered; but the whole tendency of modern progress is to remove the artificial inequalities which centuries of oppressive legislation have established. The Duke of Cambridge is still swathed in his mediæval baby-linen.

For instance, the conduct of the Duke as Ranger of the so-called Royal Parks is a proof of this assertion. When discussing the Civil Service Estimates in the House of Commons last week, Mr. Caldwell suggested that the cost of maintaining these parks should fall upon Londoners alone, as they more than any other members of the community derived the advantages which these parks afforded. To this argument it was very properly replied that the Royal Parks were equally open to all, and that all therefore should contribute towards their maintenance. But the Duke of Cambridge takes up an even more singular position than that adopted by Mr. Caldwell. According to him, the Royal Parks belong to the Royal family, which graciously permits them to be used by those who live in the neighbourhood, and that in the interests of these fortunate people the Duke, as Ranger, should do his utmost to discountenance these parks being used by others. Notwithstanding this, the entire nation must contribute towards their maintenance! These theories are mediæval. The so-called Royal Parks belong to the nation, are maintained by the nation, and should be made as beautiful, as convenient, and as agreeable as possible for the use of every well-behaved member of the community. In every other public park in London spaces are reserved for the children to play cricket and football. Every day in spring, summer, and autumn hundreds of children are turned out of Hyde Park, the Green Park, and St. James's Park for attempting to play either of these games, notwithstanding that in each of them there are large spaces where such games could be played without inconveniencing any one. In every other public park in London cycling is permitted. The cycle is a new contrivance, and, therefore, the Duke of Cambridge thinks it is his duty to discountenance it. Cyclists are debarred from using Hyde Park after noon. What possible harm could a cyclist do in Hyde Park after noon which he cannot do before noon? As for the argument, which may have been more or less correct some years ago, that the cycle frightens sensitive horses, this has lost much of its former force, for most horses now are no more frightened by a cycle than they are by a carriage. In every public park in London there is a refreshment kiosk, but in Hyde Park, the Green Park, and St. James's Park, the Duke absolutely refuses to permit such kiosks to be erected. Two years ago the House of Commons granted a substantial sum for the erection of a refreshment kiosk in Hyde Park. The Duke refused to use the money!

It was reported in these columns several weeks ago that Sir Francis Clare Ford, the British Ambassador at Rome, was suffering from serious ill-health, which might compel him to retire from the service before he had completed his term of office. Sir Francis leaves Rome immediately, and already many rumours are current as to who will be appointed to succeed him, and as to what vacancies, if any, will occur in consequence of his retirement. There appears to be little doubt entertained that Sir Philip Currie will be removed from Constantinople to Rome. It is not at all so certain, however, who will be appointed to replace Sir Philip as Ambassador to the Porte. There are many who believe that Sir Nicholas O'Conor, the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg, will be appointed to Constantinople, whilst others maintain that Sir Frank Lascelles, the British Ambassador to Berlin, will be transferred to that post. In either case this would create a vacancy, either at St. Petersburg or at Berlin, to which Sir Francis Plunkett would probably be promoted.

But the ghost of Lord Salisbury's past haunts the situation. Lord Salisbury is the Foreign Office cuckoo. He comes to the Foreign Office nest, turns out the Foreign Office offspring, and deposits his own egg—an egg which, by the way, frequently becomes addled. There is some fear, therefore, that he may deposit at the vacant Embassy some one foreign to the Foreign Office, which would be a very unjust proceeding, as it must inevitably ruin the careers of several able and experienced diplomatists by deferring promotion.

The members of this generation have short memories, otherwise we should have been reminded before now of the celebrated Ostend Manifesto which was issued in 1857 by the various Ministers of the United States then accredited to Great Britain, France, and Spain. In that manifesto it was declared that "Cuba must belong to the United States."—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

SPORTING NOTES.

It would be interesting to learn how the wretched running of Diakka at Newmarket on the first day of the Craven Meeting (April 13) is to be accounted for after his very easy victory in the Esher Stakes at Sandown Park on Friday last. I suppose there is some explanation of the astounding improvement in the horse's form in the short period of nine days, and the Stewards of the Jockey Club ought most assuredly to investigate the case, if they ever again intend to exercise their judicial functions in such matters. There ought to be one weight and one measure for all owners, but, as a matter of fact, the Newmarket principle is that whereas one man is forbidden to gaze over the hedge, yet another may with impunity enter the field and abduct the steed from its pasture. At Newmarket Diakka started without a price in the betting for the Crawfurd Plate, and finished nowhere with 9 st. 7 lb. on his back. At Sandown Diakka carried 9 st. 2 lb., was heavily backed, and won in a common canter, running, moreover, against a better field of horses than at Newmarket. The Sporting Times describes the form as "perplexing," as well it may, while the Sportsman considers that Diakka "must have come on in an extraordinary degree since last week." As a matter of fact, the horse had his field well beaten a very long way from home, and never has a race been more easily won. If Diakka had belonged to some "little man," and was trained in an "obscure stable," there would have been an execrative howling from all quarters, and the Stewards would quickly have demanded explanations from owner, trainer, and jockey; but, as a matter of fact, the authorities looked on with stupid unconcern, and it may be hoped that, in common decency, they will not attempt to investigate any future cases of suspicious running. There may be satisfactory reasons for Diakka's change of form, but, if so, they ought to be made public at once. One writer, after stating (with perfect truth) that the horse "was backed for every available penny," describes his race as "a marvellous exhibition, and the exhibition was anticipated in the market." It may be that Diakka is no use over six furlongs (the distance at Newmarket), although he is such a great horse over a mile. The numerous backers of Diakka for last year's Lincolnshire Handicap must feel disposed to cry aloud with woe when they remember that in that race (where he ran nowhere) Winkfield's Pride was giving him 16 lb., and the American horse had only 4 lb. the worst of the weights with Bridegroom, who finished third.

When the weights for the City and Suburban were published, I expressed the opinion that Bay Ronald was one of the best handicapped horses in the race, and every one knows that he was very unlucky in being beaten by Balsamo last year. It must be confessed, however, that Bay Ronald was very fortunate indeed to win last Wednesday, and it will not do to pay much attention to the form of this race. If the Australian horse, Newhaven II., had got off well he would have won in a canter, and his performance was a marvellous one, not only from the manner in which he made up his ground, but also because he was manifestly very backward. If he had been in front when the flag fell, and then had come along at his best pace, he would have won by fifty lengths. The tactics adopted with this horse seem to have been thoroughly asinine. Even with all the disadvantages of a very bad start, I believe that Newhaven II. would have won easily if he had been vigorously ridden throughout the race. Under the circumstances, it was desperate fatuity to wait with a horse of this class, and particularly over such a course as Epsom. Why the owner did not accept with him for the Chester Cup it is impossible to conjecture. He seems to be making no moves but false ones in the management (with an additional syllable) of this horse. Newhaven II. simply could not have lost at Chester with 9 st. The best course to adopt will be to run this horse for the Queen's Vase at Ascot, which he will win if he starts, and then to let him go for the Gold Cup. If Newhaven II. can stay the course, he ought to be able to defeat Galtee More, whom he is absolutely certain to beat for speed at the finish, and I do not see how a strong pace is to be arranged for unless Galtee More makes his own running, which is usually a suicidal policy when running against a horse of the class of Newhaven II. Knight of the Thistle was very seriously interfered with at Epsom, and if Mr. McCalmont's horse had been favoured with a clear course, he would certainly have finished either first or second. Sandia was another victim of the numerous mishaps for which this race will be dismally remembered by the backers of some of the beaten horses. I never had any belief in Kilcock, whose trial was all fiddle-faddle and rubbish, and some time ago I predicted that Sandia would represent the American stable instead of Berzak, who was then being sedulously written up; but the rational policy to adopt was manifestly to reserve this horse for Kempton Park, where the course will exactly suit him, and he is remarkably well in. I will deal next week with the Jubilee Handicap, which is evidently going to be a post-betting race. At the finish last Wednesday Nunsuch was decidedly favourite, but I fancy this mare is not yet at her best, and she will probably improve on her Epsom form later on in the season. It would have been funny, indeed, if, after having sold Nunsuch to the Prince of Wales, Lord William Beresford's stable had still won the race with Sandia, and this animal was regarded as a certainty, as well he might be if it is true that he was tried last year (by the time test) to be better than Diakka, when that horse was at his best. Sandia is sure to win a good handicap before long.

History was the great Newmarket tip for the Metropolitan, and he won cleverly at the finish, the favourite, Bird-on-the-Wing, being nowhere. History is a very useful horse, as he can stay well and has fair speed besides. He was thoroughly fit at Epsom, as he had undergone a special preparation for this engagement.

The three-year-olds are collapsing terribly one after the other. At Newmarket Cyllene disgraced himself, and at Sandown it was the turn of Hermiston, who, however, did not look particularly well, nor was he fancied by the Kingsclere party. The Newmarket Stakes now appears to be a very open race, and backers may congratulate themselves that Hermiston did not go for the City and Suburban.

Galtee More will not run at Newmarket this week, as Mr. Gubbins has wisely decided to reserve his horse for the Ascot Cup. The March Stakes appears to be a certainty for Newhaven II.

The Duke of Devonshire ought to win the May Plate on Friday with the filly by Morion out of Lady Yardley (dam of Buckingham and Disraeli), for which he gave 680 gs at Doncaster last September. Sixteen two-year-olds have accepted for the May Plate, for which race Heir Male and The Convict finished first and second twelve months ago.

There will be a large field for the One Thousand, which seems to be a very open race, being in this respect a great contrast to the state of affairs last year, when this event was justifiably regarded as a good thing for Chelandry, who won in a canter. It is probable that Sir Blundell Maple will start both Royal Footstep and Nun Nicer, and the latter will probably turn out to be the better for Friday's race, although her stable companion, who wants time, may beat her at Epsom a month later on. My own opinion is that neither St. Ia nor Ayah will stay the course, and La Veine, the daughter of Morion and La Flèche, does not appear to have much chance of success; but she will run for Egerton Lodge, which carried off this race two years ago with the Prince of Wales's Thais. Simylla, by St. Simon out of Palmflower, has won her trial, but she had not much to beat in the gallop. Ebba, the sister to Ladas, will (as I stated last week) be Lord Rosebery's best, but her prospects of victory are not very bright. Mr. W. Johnstone's Airosa has grown into a very nice filly, and she is expected to run well. The Duke of Westminster is to start Lowood, by St. Serf out of Rydal, but the Kingsclere people do not appear to fancy her much. The Duke of Portland may start Elizabeth Hardwicke just on the off chance; but she is not likely to stay the course. I see that Orpah is mentioned as likely to run forward, but I hear that this filly is backward, and that she will be kept for the Oaks. Lord Derby's Alt Mark has been going remarkably well in her gallops at Newmarket, and she is likely to prove a formidable outsider if she comes fit and well to the post. Her owner will be back from Egypt in time to see her run. It is dangerous to venture a prediction on this race several days in advance, and with a number of gallops pending; but if I were obliged to select one now it would be Nun Nicer, and Alt Mark for a place.

There will be racing next week at Chester and at Kempton Park, and some excellent sport is expected at both meetings. The Duke of Westminster intends to patronise Chester, and there will be a party at Eaton for the meeting. Not a bet has yet been laid on the Chester Cup, for which forty horses accepted, and there will probably be a much larger field than there was last year, when there were only twelve starters, as Count Schomberg and Shaddock frightened away so many horses, but the race proved no good thing for the former, who only won by a neck from Piety. Labrador has been undergoing a special preparation for this race, and he ought to run well on his best form with 8 st. 6 lb. on his back. The Rush and Piety are both going well at Newmarket, where it is believed that the mare will represent Mr. Dobell, and she is expected to run well, but on last year's form here she signifies Count Schomberg at 9 st. 12 lb., which seems scarcely good enough. Asterie and Villiers, and Limasol are all intended to run, and Chelandry and Nunsuch may possibly start. I fancy, however, that Merman will now prove the best of the Newmarket lot, and whatever beats the Australian horse will win, if he comes fit and well to the post. Labrador and Laughing Girl may turn out to be the most formidable opponents of Merman.

It is impossible to deal with the two-year old stakes at Chester. The colours of the Duke of Westminster may be worth following in the Mostyn Plate, but the juvenile events at this meeting are not of sufficient value to induce owners to start anything that is really smart. There are thirteen acceptances for the Dee Stakes, the entry including Dunlop, who has to carry 6 lb. extra, and I should doubt his ability to stay the course. The Duke of Westminster will probably win with Calveley or Collar, each colt having the advantage of a 7 lb. maiden allowance.

The Royal Plate of £2,000 at Kempton Park is the most valuable two-year-old race of the season, excepting only the £5,000 stake at Sandown Park in July. It is a much richer event than either the Coventry Stakes or the New Stakes at Ascot, where the programme ought to be strengthened by the addition of a far more valuable two-year-old race than it at present contains. There were 107 entries when the Royal Plate closed just about twelve months ago, and now that the final forfeit has been declared, thirty-three two-year-olds are left in. The Prince of Wales has accepted with Eventail, by Ayrshire out of Fanchette, who is a racing-like filly, and she will doubtless be galloped this week. H.R.H. has withdrawn Sandringham, the very promising own brother to Persimmon, and he will probably be reserved for Ascot, where he is entered for both the Coventry Stakes and the New Stakes. Lord Rosebery has left in Corposant (half-sister, by Sheen, to Ladas and Chelandry), and Sejanus, by Royal Hampton out of Floridiana. The Duke of Portland, who had three entries, has accepted only with Manners, own brother to Amiable, who was considered last autumn to be the best-looking of all the Welbeck yearlings. The Duke of Westminster is now represented only by Orme's Head, by Orme out of Ruth, dam of Tarporley, and if this colt starts and is backed he will be near winning, for in that case it may be taken for granted that he has been well galloped, although the Kingsclere two-year-olds do not often distinguish themselves so early in the season, being usually in reserve for Ascot. Porter, moreover, has a second string in Mr. Low's colt by Rightaway out of Hall Mark, of whose looks I have heard a great account, but he has not been galloped in any sort of way. Lord Crewe has accepted with Cup of Assay, the colt by Royal Hampton out of Assay, for which he paid 1,300 gs. at Doncaster last September. This animal is nominated for this race by his breeder, Mr. Best. Mr. T. Cannon, who had two entries, has accepted with North Britain, by Melanion out of Elspeth. Mr. Combe is represented by No Trumps, by Orvieto out of Electric Light. The Duke of Devonshire has left in both his entries, a half-brother, by Melanion, to Balsamo, and a colt by Morion out of Balornock. These animals will no doubt be galloped with Eventail, and the winner of the trial will represent the Egerton Lodge stable. Melito, by Melton out of Jeannette, a colt bred in Italy by Prince Doria, was purchased at Newmarket last July for 800 gs. by Mr. Rutherford. Mr. Fairie has Galliott, by Galopin out of Agave; and Ryan's stable is also represented by Mr. Houldsworth's Carbiston, by Donovan out of Caserta. Mr. Lawrence, who had three entries, will presumably start Dalby, by Hampton out of Exning Lass. M. Lebaudy's Sinopi, by Marcion out of Simonetta, was bought by Mr. A. James at the Newmarket December sale, for 860 gs., and he has been left in here. Sir B. Maple has St. Kenelm, by St. Simon out of Kenegie, who has thirty-four engagements. Mr. de Rothschild has accepted with four, but the supposed "crack," St. Gris, the half-brother, by Galopin, to St. Frusquin, was beaten in his trial the other day, and probably he is not yet anything like really fit. San Carlo is by St. Simon out of Biserta, dam of Goletta. Prince Soltykoff, who had three entries, has left in only Aylstone, by Sheen out of Dorothy Vernon, who has a large number of engagements. I shall make an attempt next week to predict the winner of this stake, which will be far and away the most important two-year-old race during the spring meetings.

PUBLIC SCHOOL ATHLETICS.

Last year at Stamford Bridge the London Athletic Club organised an athletic meeting for Public Schools. The club was induced to take this step chiefly by the growing interest that was taken in the public school quarter, a race which has been held since 1890. Most of the public schools had at one time or another competed for this event, and when a few years ago Fremantle, of Eton, and now President of the O.U.A.C., ran in an open two miles' handicap, it was felt that the time had come to take a further step. The members came forward and challenge cups were offered for all the events in the University programme, except the three miles, weight, and hammer, and for these a half and a three-quarter mile steeplechase were substituted. The proposed meeting met with opposition. A rival meeting was threatened by the Queen's Club, and the head masters of several schools did not view the proposal favourably. Fortunately these objections are not so strong as they were. Schools that were not allowed to send representatives last year had their boys running this year. If any head masters think there is betting and all that sort of thing at Stamford Bridge, I can assure them this is not the case. The meetings of the L.A.C. are conducted in precisely the same way as the Inter-University meeting. The open events are practically limited to members, and if there is such a good support given by the schools next year, some of the members' events will have to be cut out or else the races must be run while the high and long jumps are being brought off. The meeting last Saturday was rather too long. But to return to the schoolmasters. I believe a formal public school championship gathering would be too much of an organisation. This meeting fulfils all the essentials of such a gathering. If a schoolboy is particularly good in any event he can enter and bring credit to himself and to his school. The L.A.C. is now more strongly supported than ever by the Universities. Amongst those running in the club events last Saturday were two old Cambridge Presidents, the Rev. W. E. Lutyens and Fitz-Herbert, the old Oxford miler Munroe, and Davidson and Monro, who have done well at sprinting in both Universities. Amongst the officials on the ground were Chinnery, the President of the club, Lees Knowles, M.P., the old Cambridge miler and ex-president, and the Earl of Jersey, who with Sir Richard Webster, started the Inter-University sports, and who was president of the O.U.A.C. There were several other old Blues present. These represented all the public schools, and their opinions were unanimous that no headmaster need have the slighest hesitation in letting a boy run at such a meeting. At the conclusion of the sports, Lord Jersey distributed the prizes and strongly supported the objects of the meeting. Amongst the competitors were Apcher, the son of the old University quarter-miler, and Garnier, son of an old Oxford hurdler. No old Blue would hesitate about letting his son run at this meeting.

I hope next year some of the other big schools will be represented, and that headmasters will give the meeting their genuine support. It will be as well for them to bear in mind that it is no good letting a boy come up unless he has some real pretensions to first-class form. Now with regard to the boys themselves, this meeting affords them an opportunity of meeting the representatives of other schools as they do in cricket and football. Unless a runner goes to the University he can never get this chance. For instance, Ward, who did the phenomenal mile, is not going up to either Oxford or Cambridge. He would never have been heard of had he not run at Stamford Bridge. This meeting helps to bring together those who will represent the genuine amateur class. These are the runners whose support alone the London Athletic Club desires, and whose assistance it is now getting. The Universities are supporting the old club, which should hold in athletics the same position as the M.C.C. in cricket.

As years go on the standard of education at public schools has developed enormously. Boys now babble classics before they can walk, and revel in higher mathematics before they can run. With the progress in education their physical development has not suffered. A bigger and healthier set of boys than the winners and runners-up in the several events on Saturday it would be difficult to find. Nor could the exertions of the afternoon do them any harm. So far as book work is concerned, one at least has some pretensions to form, as good as that which he showed on the path. For Cornish has gained an open scholarship at Lincoln, Oxford—bad luck to Cambridge.

The performances were so remarkable that for the convenience of reference I have given them in tabulated form:—

Cornish, 100 yds., 10⅘, Merchant Taylors.
Cornish, 440 yds., 52⅘, Merchant Taylors.
Barry, 880 yds., 2·4⅘, St. Paul's.
Bailey, hurdles, 17⅘, St. Paul's.
Gilman, long jump, 19 ft. 8¼ in., St. Paul's.
Gilman, ¾-mile steeplechase, 4 min. 8 sec., St. Paul's.
Lascelles, high jump, 5 ft. 5¼ in., Brighton College.
Ward, one mile, 4 min. 32⅘ sec., Rossall.

With the exception of the quarter, where Whitaker, Charterhouse, did the same time in 1891; the long jump, which was won last year by Harrison, Haileybury, with 20 ft. 11 in.; the hurdles, where the time equals the previous best by Pilkington, Clifton; and the steeplechase, which was 4 secs. slower than last year, the times given above created records. A few words as to the style of the boys. Lascelles is a neat jumper with not too much weight. He goes to Cambridge this year, and should be certain of his blue. Cornish is a fine sprinter. He gets off well, but in the final hundred seemed to finish a bit weakly. Massey, of Tonbridge, came with a fine burst. He is short but squarely built, and if he practises starting he will be good. He was only just beaten by a quarter of an inch in the long jump. He ought to have beaten Gilman, but he is afraid to go as hard as he can at the take off, and he does not jump high enough. With proper coaching he should get up to 20 ft. easily. He had bad luck in not scoring a first. Gilman is a strong-built fellow with any amount of endurance and not much pace. If he is going to the University he should make a useful oar. It is doubtful if he will ever be first class on the track. Bailey has decidedly promising form over the hurdles. It is said Shaw, the ex-champion, has been coaching him. Young Garnier, Sherborne, also flew well, but could not stay the distance. The half-mile was a splendid race, and Barry showed good judgment. He is undoubtedly likely to come on. He only just beat Draper, Rossall, who has the prettier style but ran with bad judgment, and let the winner get too far away, two hundred yards from home. Both quarters in this race were run at the same pace. In the quarter, Cornish made the pace all through. He has a long, low stride, but will have to take care not to let himself down on his heels. The mile was won by Ward. He cut out the pace from the beginning, and was never headed. People wondered if he could last when the first quarter was done in 64 sec., and the half in 2 min. 13 sec., but he came home in strong style. He is a short, broad-shouldered, lightly-built youth, with a very easy style, spoilt by a tendency to sprawl out his elbows and turn out his toes. Kinsman, of Lancing, was second. He did 4 min. 38 sec., a very fine performance. He is not so filled out as Ward, but with age and experience, which he sadly lacks, he should make a first-class miler. In speaking of the sprinters I forgot to mention Rhys, of Aldenham. He has a very graceful style, and if he grows a bit bigger and stronger he will come on a good deal. Dickinson, of Repton, ran pluckily in the steeplechase.

There were too many other events. In the open hundred Palmer, the champion, failed by two yards in his heat, which was won in 10½, and Jupp, who made his first public appearance, had 1¾ yards start and won the final performance. Cornish's time makes him better than either, with Massey close up. But then last year the sprinting champions were platers. The mile handicap was beautifully arranged by Parker, and Lutyens and Munro ran through from scratch and were first and second respectively, young Dixon just being third. Old Dixon, the father, was running. He would be consulting his own dignity and the interests of sport by not turning out. It is not an exhilarating sight to see a middle-aged man toddling along with a long limit. He is just as much a nuisance to the handicapper as the boy runners of a few years back. Monro who is up at Oxford, won the 220 yards challenge cup, just beating Davison, who was running for Cambridge a year ago. Fitzherbert cameled well for half distance, but being out of condition, failed to last. I do hope this brilliant runner will put in some hard work and show what he really can do. Wilkins won the steeplechase challenge cup from Munro.

What the London Athletic Club is doing for running, the Amateur Cycling Association will try to do for cycling. The association has recently been inaugurated in order to provide racing for the gentleman amateur. The class of men one meets as a rule in the amateur ranks are not the sort with whom every one cares to associate, although some of them are no doubt very decent fellows. The definition of an amateur as laid down by the association is practically the Henley definition, except that, instead of the proviso about being engaged in boats, the word bicycles is substituted, and certain other verbal alterations are made to suit the circumstances of the case. The club will be run by a committee consisting of two members each, or one —I forget which—from Oxford, Cambridge, the United Hospitals, Sheen House, and the London Bicycle Club, and two others elected annually by the club. Everybody seeking election must be known personally to two club members, who will submit the name for election to the committee, when two black-balls will exclude.

Properly worked this association should do a lot of good. It should not only provide races for members, but it should be enabled to authorise racing at cycling gymkhanas, where some genuine racing, instead of mere fancy events, would be most interesting. Already this association has received a great deal of support, and I have no doubt cyclists will appreciate its efforts. The association will be affiliated to the National Cyclists' Union. This was done because the Union was recognised by the association as having done its best for amateurism. Circumstances have prevented the Union from making a gentleman amateur class, and the formation of this association is the right way out of the difficulty. The N.C.U is to be congratulated on the fight it has waged against the makers' amateur. This was a rider in the secret pay of a company who posed as an amateur. The Dunlop Company has climbed down, and given an undertaking not to continue these tactics. Other cycling companies are being tackled, and the results will, no doubt, be as satisfactory as in the Dunlop case.

Judging by the enthusiasm shown at the Queen's Club during the covered court lawn tennis championships, the popularity of the game is not diminishing. In the ladies' competition, Miss Leigh, who is very steady at the back of the court, to most people's surprise beat Miss Cooper, but, in turn, she was defeated by the holder, Miss Austin, who was just a bit better all round. The final of the gentlemen's singles was disappointing. H. L. Doherty, the challenger, had played a brilliant game against Greville. When he met Eaves he was off colour and never looked like winning, while the champion was in his best form. However, the loser and R. F. Doherty played a great game in the doubles, the elder brother playing at the back of the court and his partner at the net. They were much too good for the holders of the title, Greville and Nesbit. Miss Cooper and R. F. Doherty won the new competition, the mixed doubles, after a splendid match with Greville and Miss Austin. Doherty's volleying was splendid.

There will be a strong contingent of old cricketing Blues available at both 'Varsities this term. Oxford lose Hartley, Bardswell, and Waddy, of whom the first-named will, of course, be a loss, which the Cambridge men will regret, but the other two, on last year's form, will not be so badly missed. From Cambridge Druce, Mitchell, and Bray retire after four years' residence, and as both Marriott and Shine are schoolmasters, it is more than probable that there will be five vacancies to be filled. The Oxford men will have a strong batting side. Those who, from nervousness, failed last year, should do much better. Foster, Champain, Bromley Martin, Fane, and Eccles are all good batsmen, and two of them have had some experience of county cricket. There are plenty of candidates as batsmen. Amongst the seniors, Parkes, Rowe, and Page are the best, and I shall be very much surprised if Rowe does not get a sound trial. As a schoolboy he was in the first flight, and cannot surely have lost his form in a single season. But there is a freshman in Collins of Marlborough that may cut out all the seniors. Unless I am mistaken, he is certain to get his blue. Crawford of Merchant Taylors, is another promising bat. Two bowlers will be necessary to replace Hartley and Waddy. Stocks will be tried, and as he was unlucky to be left out last year, will doubtless get a place; but he is very much the same style as Cunliffe, and on a good wicket never does much damage. His reputation has been made on one or two performances, and never in any season has he had even a moderately good record. Lee, who was tried for Hampshire, will be a far more useful man, as he is an all-round player. He bowls right hand, and can go on all day. Another bowler with a good reputation is More of Westminster. One old Blue, E. C. Wright, will have to work hard to keep his place. After making a fair start last year he fell off tremendously, and was hardly worth his place at the time of the University match. The three places vacant will probably be filled by Lee, Collins, and Stocks, while Rowe might get a place. The eleven will be a strong one, but will need a fast bowler.

The Cambridge men lose their wicket-keeper, three batsmen, and a bowler. To take Bray's place there is a first-class man in Taylor, who, as a batsman, averaged over 80 at Uppingham. He failed as a bat last year. There is a reserve man in L. J. Moon, who is almost worth a place as a batsman if he would conquer his desire to hit every ball for four. Another senior, A. T. Coode, is well worth a trial. He has made so many runs that he must have some first class ability in him. These three are the only seniors likely to do any good. Amongst the Freshmen there are three who may turn out first class. Cole, of Harrow, is a tried performer, and can bowl what one often hears described as "tolerable stuff of the rubbish order." With practice he should improve a lot. Hind, of Uppingham, is a good left hand bowler; he can make the ball do a little both ways, and, in addition, he is a good bat. In Campbell, Scotchmen declare they have trained a first-class cricketer. The last Scotch boy to gain his blue was Jardine, who scored a century for Oxford, and it is said that Campbell, who, by the way, is a Rugby blue, is quite the equal of the old Oxford captain. In bowling, Spencer, of Rugby, is a likely man, while of the old bowlers Fernie may have some trouble in keeping his place. He certainly makes the batsman wait a long time for the ball, but there is not much sting in it when it arrives. Shine will be missed. Burnup, as a bat, is invaluable. He will be up again. It is said that Jessop is ill. It would be a fearful loss if he could not play, but perhaps there is nothing in the rumour. On the whole, I think Cambridge will probably not be so strong as last year, whilst their opponents will be better.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—War has at last broken out between the United States and Spain, and to judge from the fluctuations which have taken place during the last few days, the state of extreme panic which prevailed at one time has been surmounted. In fact, it is not improbable that the old Stock Exchange saying, of which I reminded my readers a few weeks ago, will be borne out in the present instance, that in case of an impending war you can safely buy stocks.

After the First Shot is Fired.

The first shot, which makes history in this instance, was that fired across the bows of the Buena Ventura by the American cruiser Nashville. On Friday morning the lowest quotations of American Rails, so far received from New York, came to hand, and from that time an important recovery set in, which was not by any means confined to the American department, but spread to the various favourites of the Paris Bourse which have of late shown such exceptional weakness, viz., De Beers, Rio Tinto, and Spanish. At one time Spanish bonds dropped to 30½, but a recovery to 34¾ has since been established, and while I should not care to prophesy too much on this stock, I yet fancy that the weight of the fall has now been broken. Another circumstance which has had a favourable effect upon all the markets has been the comparatively satisfactory statement of the Bank of England, and the maintenance of the 4 per cent. Bank rate. This put Home Rails into better humour, especially when it was announced that further arrivals of gold were expected from Germany, and Consols, too, finally braced up. The fact is, that in the present range of values a state of war has been fully discounted. For weeks far-sighted men have looked upon war between the two nations as inevitable, and every preparation was made for the evil day. Not only had engagements been reduced to the utmost possible extent, but a very considerable "Bear" account had grown up. When the first shot was fired and the above-mentioned more favourable circumstances transpired, the ursine party commenced to cover, and thus contributed to the general advance. There is no doubt that the "Bears" have taken great liberties with nearly all the departments, but more especially with Spanish and those French favourites already referred to, as well as the South African and West Australian mining sections. In the Kaffir Circus so small a speculative account existed, that the covering movement now commenced is likely to have far-reaching consequences, provided only that we get no further immediate rise in the Bank rate. As regards the temporary collapse in the Westralian department, it was as unreasonable as most of such movements are, and the recovery which has commenced should develop into a sharp rebound. It is for investors who can keep their heads cool to avail themselves of the opportunities thus supplied. A sharp decline also occurred in Argentine Government and Railway stocks, while South Americans generally were flat. But the set back was apparently altogether exaggerated, and holders will do well not to be frightened into selling. Apart from the Spanish-American war, the political horizon is clearer than it has been for a long time, and both the Far Eastern and West African questions seem for the time to be forgotten.

Money and Gilt-Edged Investments.

At the commencement of last week the view generally prevailed that with the outbreak of war an advance in the Bank Rate to 5 per cent. would at once take place, and this has been one of the strongest points urged by the "Bears." The Bank return, however, did not prove so unsatisfactory as had been looked for, and the fact that German gold to a considerable amount was sent in to the Bank of England must be considered encouraging. These shipments are made in connection with the last Chinese Loan, and have been greatly facilitated by the Bank of England making advances without charging interest, on the condition that gold was remitted. As far as I can learn, about one million has been contracted for, of which up to the present about a quarter has arrived here. There are several millions on the way from other quarters, and unless the American demand for gold should assume very large proportions, there is just the possibility of our squeezing through the state of war with a four or five per cent. Bank rate. I should think that the Americans are not likely to take any steps which would unduly raise the value of money here, as it would at once react upon their own Money Market. The United States Government is apparently raising an internal loan through the post-offices, which would not affect the European markets at all. But it will be some time before we return again to easy money, and it is this consideration chiefly which is causing the selling of certain gilt-edged investments, especially of prior lien, debenture, and other home railway prior charges, to which I have repeatedly drawn attention, and which is best illustrated by the following little table:—

	Highest 1897.	This Week.	Fall.
	£.	£.	£.
Great Western 5 per cent. Pref.	189½	176	13½
London and North-Western 4 per cent. Pref.	154¾	142½	12¼
North-Eastern 4 per cent. Pref. ...	153½	141½	12
Great Eastern 4 per cent. Pref. ...	150¾	139½	11¼
Caledonian 4 per cent. Pref.	152	140½	11½
London and North-Western 3 per cent. Debs.	122	112½	9½
Caledonian 4 per cent. Debs.... ...	156	147½	8½
Great Western 4 per cent. Debs. ...	158¾	147½	11¼
Great Eastern 4 per cent. Debs. ...	152¾	144½	8¼
North-Eastern 3 per cent. Debs. ...	119½	111½	8

I have more than once drawn attention to the almost prohibitive prices of these securities, and I am not surprised that values should at last have given way. Investors and bankers who hold these stocks evidently are parting with them, as they have better use for the money. Consols reached their highest point last year, when 113⅞ was touched. This week they fell to 109¾, and are now up again at 110⅜, leaving a decline of 3½ from the top figure. It cannot be said that Consols at 110 indicate any very great alarm in financial quarters. In other high-class investment stocks there have also been falls ranging from six to ten points. Thus, representative British Corporation stocks are from eight to ten lower, Manchester Three per Cent. stock distinguishing itself by a loss of 12½. The relapse in Colonial bonds extends in the case of New South Wales Four per Cents. to ten points from the top price in 1897, while Canadian Three and a Half per Cents. have given way 8½, Victoria Three and a Half per Cents. 8, Tasmania 5. India Stock is from 7 to 8 per cent. lower, but other influences have been at work in this instance. There is a fashion in all things, and I suppose that gilt-edged stocks will be out of favour for a little while, especially as bargains are now to be picked up in second and third-class and more speculative securities. The new Chinese loan has not altogether maintained the recent improvement, being quoted 1⅞ discount; but the other Chinese loans have remained steady. Japanese Scrip is quoted 100¼. Silver is firmer at 25$\frac{15}{16}$d., while the quotation for forward delivery is 25$\frac{13}{16}$d.

Home Rails—A Recovery.

When rumours were rife of a further immediate advance in the Bank rate the "Bear" contingent in the Home Railway department naturally pricked up their ears and sold down stocks. I do not here refer to the gilt-edged descriptions, to which I have just devoted some attention, and in which sales by real holders were effected or attempted. I am dealing with the Ordinary and Deferred stocks of the active list, in which the ursine party have always taken a lively interest. Their argument, of course, is that with a Bank rate at 4 or possibly 5 per cent. securities yielding from 3 to 4 per cent. are no catch. Against this line of argument there has to be set the probability that the war will not be of long duration, and that as soon as the end is in sight the value of money will fall smartly. Again the leading Home Railways are doing exceedingly well, and while the comparison is somewhat complicated through the different dates on which the Easter holidays fell, the fact that for the first fifteen weeks of the present year a traffic increase of £557,000 is shown is certainly encouraging. To some extent the war will no doubt interfere with the shipment of goods to the United States, but this will, no doubt, be counterbalanced by the supplies of arms, ammunition, &c., which are being so heavily drawn from here. The most important point, however, is that there is absolutely no stock in the market here, and not only are real holders disinclined to sell, but investors have already commenced to pick up further small amounts on the decline. This, together with repurchases by "Bears," is causing a substantial recovery. Brighton "A" at one time receded to 173½, and have since rallied to 175. Dover "A" touched 105¾, and recovered to 107½. Great Eastern are quoted 119, after touching 118¼. The stocks of the Heavy division had dropped a couple of points, of which about half has been regained. South-Western Ordinary experienced the heaviest fall, having dropped to 217½, from which there was a rally to 219½, which compares with 222½ a week ago. Great Centrals have hardly moved, and the stocks of the underground lines, after a slight reaction, are improving, Metropolitan Districts being quoted 27⅜. In the Scotch section Caledonian Deferred Ordinary and North British Deferred receded at one time to 55 and 41¾ respectively, and have now risen again to 55¼ and 42¼. In the shares of the Central London Railway a moderate business has been passing in the fully-paid Ordinary at 10¼.

The Yankee Market—A Rally on the Actual Outbreak of War.

From the point of view of the Stock Markets, nothing is more depressing than a state of uncertainty, such as has prevailed during the last month, as to whether war would break out or not. In order to be able to face the worst, operators, large and small, no doubt, threw overboard big blocks of American Railroad stock, while again the "Bears" committed themselves to a considerable extent on the short side. All things considered, the Yankee market has stood the adverse influences remarkably well, and only on Thursday was a real slump in progress in Wall-street, during which the low prices were again touched which prevailed about a month ago, when on the rumours that Spain had declared war against the United States, Milwaukee dropped to 88¼, Louisville to 46¼. I said last week that at anything like these figures purchases to a moderate extent should be fairly safe, and on Friday morning my readers had an opportunity of buying Milwaukee at 86 and Louisville at 45¾, which they could have sold a day after at 88¼ and 48⅛ respectively. I should think that there will be a good many fluctuations in the near future, according to any incidents in the war operations, which may at one time or other favour this or that side. Any one who has a wish to go in for a little gamble should therefore buy on declines, viz., when the market is flat, and sell on recoveries, when the market is good. Milwaukee, Louisville, Union Pacific Ordinary and Prefs., are perhaps some of the most suitable securities to deal in, and care should be taken not to go into stocks for which there is very little market. The Louisville is expected to benefit very largely from the movement of the United States' troops to Florida, while the Milwaukee has got the strong Standard Oil group at its back. I dare say, however, that there will also be a considerable market in Norfolk Prefs., Northern Pacific Prefs., and Atchison Prefs. Whether there will be a good old-fashioned panic in the American department must, of course, depend upon the possibility of a United States defeat at sea, and any one speculating in American Rails must count the cost of this possibility. It may be as well to refer to some of the former panics which Wall-street has experienced, and concerning which the following extract from the New York Times will be of interest:—

> It was in 1873 that Wall-street had the greatest money panic in its history. Conditions had been growing more and more unfavourable, and the nervousness of the Stock Market steadily increased. Although high rates for money obtained early in 1873, it was not until April that their influence was severely felt. In this month as high as ¾ of 1 per cent. per day was paid for call loans, and thereupon began a decline in Stock Market values which continued all summer and culminated in the great panic of September, when many houses were forced to suspend. The extent of the decline in stock prices has been given heretofore, but they are important enough to bear repetition. St. Paul declined from 62¼ to 21½, Rock Island from 117⅝ to 80½, Northwest from 85 to 31½, Erie from 69¼ to 35⅝, Lake Shore from 97¾ to 57¼, Lackawanna from 106 to 79½, Union Pacific from 39½ to 14¾, and Western Union from 94½ to 43¼.

So far, the falls from the highest points touched this year do not exceed $16. The next great scare was the Baring panic in November, 1880, when Burlington and Quincy fell from 108⅝ to 80, Milwaukee from 78¾ to 44, and Rock Island from 98⅝ to 61½. A year of panic was also 1893, when a financial crisis was rampant in the United States, and more recently we have had the Venezuela panic. With the lessons of former violent scares in New York in our minds, it will, undoubtedly, be wise not to operate too largely, and to go for short turns until the upshot of the war can be pretty well foreseen. A period will doubtless arrive when peace rumours will commence to influence the markets, and then we may look for jumps in quotations; but until the Spanish and American fleets have measured their strength, it would be dangerous to come to conclusions. Some day "Bull" points will be cropping up in all directions, and one of these will doubtless be the excellent outlook for the winter wheat which is reported from the States. I suppose that the Baltimore and Ohio reorganisation will be delayed by the outbreak of hostilities, but this will, no doubt, be undertaken sooner or later, and the following extract from the Wall-street Daily Financial News gives an account of the present position of the matter:—

> The Bill which recently passed the Maryland Legislature, and which has just been signed by Governor Lawndes, was the creation of Mr. Cowen, President of the road and one of the receivers, and Mr. Bacon, of the firm of P. J. Morgan & Co., and is entirely in the Morgan interest in reorganisation. The efforts in Baltimore to get an association of the bankers there to place the bonds for a reorganisation, under Maryland auspices, were futile, and were met, on the Morgan side, by placing various bankers and bank Directors of Baltimore on the Committee in order to give the Bill a Baltimore look. Mr. Morgan has carried every point he wished to make, and this is the beginning of a reorganisation of the soft coal roads and the bringing of the hard and soft coal roads and interests of the country into harmonious interest. Mr. Morgan regarded the Baltimore and Ohio as the key to the entire coal situation, and for this reason great care was taken to so form the Bill as to promote the most rapid and unobstructed progress in reorganising the Baltimore and Ohio, in order that its effect might be immediate, wide spread, and lasting on the values of Reading securities and other coal interests in which Mr. Morgan and his clients in this country and Europe are so largely interested.

Canadian Pacifics have attracted a great deal of attention during the past week, and fluctuations have been very wild. At first a strong selling movement took place, which seemed to emanate from Berlin, and has since been ascertained to have originated in the forced closing of a large account. The lowest price touched was 75, from which a very sharp recovery has occurred to 78¾. Even at this level this stock is exceedingly cheap. Not only are earnings still on a large scale, but it is absolutely certain that this road will obtain a very large accession of traffic both in passengers and goods, from the fact that steamers formerly calling at United States Atlantic ports will be diverted to those of Canada, and it is stated that the Canadian Pacific has facilities for handling four times the traffic at Montreal that it is at present carrying. Canadian Pacifics are, therefore, at the present quotation, a very promising, progressive investment, in which the danger to United States railroad stocks of an American defeat is absent. Grand Trunks have been supported by the same circumstance, but in this instance there has not been such a heavy relapse as in Canadian Pacifics. Those who are acting as sponsors of the speculation in Grand Trunks are predicting very much higher values for these stocks than those at present ruling of 72 for the Guaranteed and 65¾ for the First Prefs.

Foreigners and South Americans.

The outbreak of war at one time caused a complete collapse on the Paris Bourse, the further heavy decline in Spanish, which took place during the week, and amounted to no less than 10 points, bringing about a scare in the French capital. A week ago Spanish stood at 40½, and during the last few days they touched 30½. This very sharp fall exercised a most depressing effect upon other interbourse securities, De Beers, South African gold shares, Rio Tinto, and other favourites being thrown overboard wholesale. At last the turning-point was reached, and under the influence of big purchases by leading Paris houses a general improvement set in, Spanish being now up again at 34⅛. Italians are also firmer. The chief weakness is now in Portuguese, the fall in the exchange at Lisbon being given as a reason, and this is doubtless due to the war trouble in the neighbouring kingdom. I used to say that whoever bought Spanish at 60 to hold was sleeping on a volcano, and the recent relapse to half the value of Spanish Fours has certainly borne out my repeated warnings. Spain will now have an excuse for at least partial default. Yet at 30 Spanish are a dangerous "Bear," as they must certainly be considered superior to Greeks. The South American department market has also been affected by the outbreak of war and fears of dear money. This has brought about a good deal of liquidation in Argentine Government and Railway stocks, and the position is no doubt sounder after the shake-out, although it will be unwise to buy too heavily of these stocks until the outlook is clearer. The Argentine Funding Loan now stands at 84½, the 1886 Loan at 86¾. Amongst the railway issues Buenos Ayres Great Southern are quoted 139 x.d., Buenos Ayres and Rosario 68 x d., Central Argentine 76½, Cordoba Central (Central Northern Section) Income Debenture stock 43. An internal loan is at present being issued in Argentina, and if that should prove successful, the position will be considerably improved. It appears, however, that the participation of the various London banks dealing with South America is invited. The "Bears" did their best to depress Mexican Sixes at one time by spreading rumours that trouble between Mexico and the States was probable. But it appears that President Diaz is absolutely opposed to any such foolish action, and, after dropping to 90, the old Mexican Six per Cent. loan has recovered to 93. Uruguay bonds have been fairly steady, the Old Loan at 44¾, the New Loan at 54. Great weakness has again been shown by Brazilians, on a further drop in the exchange, the 1889 loan now having declined to 42½. Peruvian Corporation stocks, after giving way, are bracing up again.

The Kaffir Circus—A Scare and a Recovery.

During the past week the Kaffir Circus has felt the full weight of the war scare, a fresh blow having been given to quotations by a semi-panic on the Paris Bourse. It is not at the first blush quite intelligible why South African mines, producing increasing quantities of gold, and yielding at the present level of prices of the shares large returns, should be affected by the outbreak of hostilities between the United States and Spain. Yet all the Paris favourites were thrown overboard last week, with the result of heavy declines. French operators in Spanish, De Beers, Rio Tinto, &c., seeing values fall lower and lower, were obliged to sell other stocks to provide for their losses. In the case of De Beers the false rumour was circulated that the syndicate, which has contracted for the 1898 output of diamonds, would, by the war between the United States and Spain, be relieved of its contract. The old tale of "give a lie a start" is applicable to the continued set-back which occurred in De Beers to 23½, and it was only after the report had been contradicted, and the Paris Bourse had pulled itself together again, that the quotation rallied to 24$\frac{15}{16}$. Rio Tinto, were also sold down on the tale that an export duty would be put on copper by Spain, and a heavy fall was thus occasioned. Now, however, with the rise in Spanish and in De Beers comes also an advance in Rio Tinto Deferred to 26$\frac{5}{16}$, and unless any very adverse circumstance should happen, there is every prospect of a further rally not only in these shares but also in South African mining and finance shares, which have been so heavily attacked by ursine operators, while at the same time suffering by realisations for Paris account. Prices were more particularly depressed in the case of the speculative stocks, such as Rand Mines, which fell at one time to 25⅛, in East Rands, which touched 3⅝, and in Consolidated Goldfields, which were down to 3$\frac{9}{16}$. But the relapse extended to the whole list. To show how important the decline was which took place at one time, I have drawn up a table of the highest prices touched in 1897, the panic

According to all accounts received from the mines the position in the Witwatersrand district is satisfactory, and, unless money should get dearer, the improvement in quotations here will doubtless make further progress. The mail reports with regard to the Rand Mines meeting are now to hand, and are in every respect encouraging. The news with reference to the East Rand and its subsidiary undertakings is also of a favourable character, and the Transvaal Goldfields has declared a dividend of 5 per cent. for the year. The various Deep Level properties are doing well, and the fall in prices which occurred last week is being recovered again. Under ordinary circumstances the enthusiastic meeting of the Chartered shareholders last Thursday would probably have had a favourable effect upon quotations of Kaffir shares, but it came precisely on the day when the panic in Paris was at its worst, and thus its bearing upon the general market was infinitesimal, although the latter also braced up next day. Rarely has such a crowd been attracted to the Cannon-street Terminus Hotel, and those present were apparently well satisfied with what Mr. Rhodes had to tell them. Personally I do not share his views as regards the agricultural value of Rhodesia, but think rather that the future of the country will depend upon the prospect of gold being won on a remunerative scale. A few months will decide this question, as the Geelong and several other mines will then be crushing. In the meantime I have no doubt that the shareholders will take up the further 250,000 shares now offered to them, as the price is being "pegged" at $2\frac{3}{8}$—$\frac{7}{16}$, so as to secure to them, at least for the time being, a tempting profit on the issue price of 2. In view of the present depression in De Beers it would almost, on the face of it, appear to show an excess of courage on the part of the directors of the New Bultfontein Company to invite subscriptions for an issue of £50,000 Six per Cent. First Mortgage Debentures at par, repayable at 103 by September 1, 1905. But the issue is undoubtedly well secured, and has besides the advantage of being convertible, as to one moiety, into Ordinary shares at the rate of £1 5s. per share, thus giving the Debenture holders the chance of benefiting by an advance in the shares, which have been at a very much higher quotation, and will doubtless again improve, as the position of the Company is shown to be excellent.

Golden West Australia.—A Severe Spasm.

One of the severest and most dangerous spasms that has ever visited the West Australian department occurred last week, when somewhat unexpectedly the South African market gave way to a panic, and a strong "Bear" raid was executed upon "Kangaroos." Various rumours had for some time been current, which were calculated to prevent investors from making purchases in this section, the downward tendency of the Market Trust group having given rise to all kinds of tales. It is satisfactory to learn that an arrangement has been come to which will obviate all difficulties, and the strong combination which appears to have been formed is already forcing prices up again, Northern Territories leading the recovery. Another damaging report was that concerning the Great Boulder Proprietary, to which I have already referred last week. I then stated that the rumours which were given out were false, but it apparently required further intelligence to break the power of the "Bear" attack which was made. This has now been furnished by the following cablegram of the manager, which in view of the importance of the matter, I herewith reproduce in full :—

Assays from borings in face of drift west cross-cut main shaft 400 ft. level 1 ft. sections, assay value per ton, 4 dwt., 3 oz. 2 dwt., 12 dwt., 10 oz. 7 dwt., 4 oz. Have driven a cross-cut to the lode under the slide in the bottom of winze 300 ft. level; assays 1 ft. sections assay value per ton, 3 oz. 15 dwt., 1 oz. 9 dwt, 9 dwt., 12 dwt., 55 oz., 9 oz. 3 dwt. Further information by cable later. Have driven a cross-cut to the lode to the west of 300 ft. level 100 ft. to the north or Edwards Shaft; the width of the lode is 1 ft. 6 in.; assay value, 2 oz. 5 dwt. Doolette Shaft cross-cut to the west 200 ft. level; the width of the lode is 4 ft.; assay value per ton, 14 dwt. Have driven upon the vein a distance of 10 ft.; ore in the drift has an average assay of 1 oz. 2 dwt." Office note: "The assays above given average at the 300 ft. level 11 oz. 14 dwt. and at the 400 ft. level 3 oz. 13 dwt."

The Great Boulder was the first mine which made the reputation of the West Australian goldfields, and it would indeed be a misfortune for the Colony if the rich ore were to give out. Fortunately, the above cablegram shows conclusively that such is not the case, while further confirmatory cablegrams have come to hand since. Another satisfactory fortnightly crushing is also announced. The price of the new shares dropped at one time to 17s., from which there was a rally to 18s. 6d., and it is within my knowledge that those most intimately connected with the mine have bought the shares very heavily, thus showing their confidence in the position. The "Bear" attack was, however, not confined to the Great Boulder, but all the high-class shares were raided with equal zest. Lake View Consols dropped at one time to $7\frac{1}{2}$, Ivanhoe to $4\frac{1}{4}$, Hannan's Brownhill to $6\frac{1}{2}$. From these figures there has been a very important recovery, Lake View Consols being again up at $8\frac{3}{16}$, Ivanhoe at $4\frac{7}{8}$, and Hannan's Brownhill at $7\frac{1}{16}$. Absolutely nothing has occurred to justify the slightest fall in these high-class shares, and investors who can afford to buy them now have an excellent opportunity of reaping handsome profits. An effort was also made to put down London and Globe Finance shares, but these promptly rallied to $1\frac{7}{16}$, and now that the scare has passed off, we shall probably see a more active business than for some time past. The following is a list of the crushings announced during the week :—

—	Tons of Ore Crushed.	Oz. of Gold.	Assay of Tailings per ton.
Ivanhoe	993	1,500	13 dwt.
North Boulder	447	401	—
Yalgoo Proprietary	23	24	—

The Ivanhoe crushing is satisfactory, and the Golden Arrow return suggests an improvement in the mine. From the Sons of Gwalia some favourable news is to hand by a British Australasian cablegram, according to which the south drive at the 200-ft. level is now in 44 ft. The ore has been taken out for a width of 6 ft. along the entire distance, and averages 4 oz. of free gold to the ton. Fire assays give a return of 11 oz. The winze is down 70 ft. below the 100-ft. level. The ore right across the winze shows a width of 5 ft., worth 4 oz. of free gold to the ton. The Hannan's Brownhill mill is obtaining a splendid extraction equal to nearly 90 per cent. In the Great Boulder Main Reef the western lode is opening up splendidly at the 170 and 270 ft. levels, the telluride being very rich. The battery and cyanide plant are running well. The April yield will be a record one One of the most unjustifiable movements was a temporary decline in Lady Shenton shares, apparently owing to a small "Bear" raid, and on sales by some necessitous holders who were compelled to sell in order to provide money for paying differences on other shares. The fall was, however, promptly recovered, the quotation rebounding to 2⅛. It is hardly necessary to state that the news from the mine continues excellent, and while 20 per cent. was paid in dividends last year, the returns on the present scale foreshadow dividends of from 30 to 40 per cent. for 1898, and arrangements are in progress which are likely to cause a sharp rise in the shares. Two adjoining mines are the Florence (into which the Lady Shenton lode dips, and the shares of which are well worth picking up at ⅝) and the Queensland Gold Mining Company. The latter is a Colonial-owned Company, and the shares are not held to any extent on this side. It may, however, be interesting to state on the authority of the London agents, Messrs. R. Clayton & Co., that the crushings to the end of June, 1898, were 4,309 tons of ore for 17,203 ounces of gold, an average of 33 19.8 dwt. per ton. In February, 1898, 237 tons returned 957 oz., an average of 4.4 oz., while in March, 1898, 190 tons were crushed for 953 oz., an average of 5.2 oz. Up to January, 1898, dividends of 80 per cent. were paid, and distributions of 10 per cent. each were paid in January and April, 1898, so that up-to-date dividends to the amount of 100 per cent. have been paid. There is, in addition, a large sum retained in hand for the purpose of completing the sinking of the main shaft, which was commenced on February 2, 1898. I mention these particulars as showing how very rich this portion of the Menzies district is. A sharp decline has taken place in Golden Horseshoes, which has been but partly recovered at 6¼. West Australian Goldfields have been flat at 1⅜, and Hampton Plains have also given way, although hardening slightly at the last to $\frac{11}{16}$. The circular dated the 28th inst. concerning latest developments on the various blocks of this property are considered very favourable. By the way, a very useful booklet of travels through the goldfields of Western Australia and New Zealand, entitled "Wealth and Wild Cats," by Raymond Radclyffe, is published by Downey & Co., Limited, 12, York-street, Covent Garden, W.C. Some very interesting data may be gathered from this little volume of travels.

Indian, Australasian, and British Columbian Mines.

While all the departments of the Mining Market are in a state of depression, it is not likely that any of the outside sections would show strength. Thus, Indian gold mines have been neglected. Ooregum Ordinary and Prefs. are lower, and there have been declines in Mysore Gold, Nundydroog, Mysore Reefs, Balaghat, and Goldfields of Mysore. Amongst Australian mines, other than West Australian, Mount Lyells have again been the weak point on fears that the late Mr. Crotty's shares may come on the market. A further fall has therefore taken place in Mount Lyell to 11¼ x.d., Mount Lyell North to 2¼, Mount Lyell South to ½. From these points Mount Lyells rallied to 12¼, Mount Lyell North to $2\frac{9}{16}$, Mount Lyell South to $\frac{9}{16}$. Mount Morgan have also been dull at $4\frac{1}{16}$ x.d. New Zealand Mines, too, have displayed weakness, Waitekauri, Waihi, and Woodstock all being lower. There is just one little piece of news of an encouraging character, viz., a cablegram has been received from the joint manager of the Australian Gold Trust and New Zealand Pioneers, according to which on Block 3 of the Taitapu Gold Estate, 20 tons of ore crushed from the No. 1 level yielded 65 oz. of gold. In the general foreign section, Frontino and St. John del Rey are lower. Copper shares have been adversely affected by the collapse of Rio Tinto on the Paris Bourse, but with the recovery in these they are picking up again. In British Columbian mines a few moderate declines are shown, but there has been a rally at the last, and I should also think that British America Corporation would improve. It is understood that the special settlement will be granted for the end of May. A reader of Truth in Victoria, B.C., sends me copies of the Victoria Daily Colonist, in one of which the Lake Bennett and Klondike Steam Navigation Company, Limited (to which I referred in Truth of March 10 in adverse terms), is subjected to some chaffing comment. Among the London Directors were the Earl of Dunmore, Messrs. R. Byron Johnson, Henry McDowell, Arthur J. Sanderson, and The O'Clery, and the local Advisory Board was stated to comprise the Hon. David W. Higgins and Mr. J. W. Powell. In the following issue of the Victoria Daily Colonist, however, Mr. Higgins, who is the Speaker of the B.C. Legislative Assembly, makes the announcement that the use of his name on the prospectus of the Lake Bennett and Klondike Navigation Company, Limited, was entirely unauthorised by him, and that he never heard of the Company until he read the prospectus in a London paper. Mr. Higgins added that the statements in the prospectus were glaringly false. I am not at all sure that the Company has floated, but in any case it seems to me that the London Directors above-mentioned should render an explanation of these extraordinary allegations.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new enterprises and issues have been placed before the public during the week:—

The Tasmanian Tin Dredging Company, Limited.—This Company is formed with a capital of £50,000, divided into 15,000 10 per cent. cumulative preference shares and 35,000 ordinary shares of £1 each for the purpose of developing and working six Crown dredging leases, of about three miles in extent, of the bed and channel of the Ringarooma River, Tasmania. Ten thousand preference shares are reserved for working capital, and have been subscribed and allotted.

The New Bultfontein Mining Company, Limited.—This is an issue of £50,000 Six per Cent. First Mortgage Debentures in bonds of £50 each, secured on the landed property, buildings, plant, &c., of the Company. The debentures are issued at par, and repayable at £103 by five annual drawings of £10,000 each, commencing in 1901. The Company was incorporated in 1895 to work fifty-eight claims in the Bultfontein Diamond Mines, and by subsequent amalgamation with other mines the area was increased to 148 claims. The property is well equipped with machinery, and is now in work.

The security for these debentures appears to be ample, and, moreover, the holders have the option for two years of converting a moiety of their holding into Ordinary shares at the rate of £1 5s. per share.

Brooks & Doxey, Limited.—With a share capital of £200,000 and an issue of £100,000 Debenture stock, this Company is formed for the purpose of acquiring and working the business of textile machinists, carried on by Messrs. Brooks & Doxey, at West Gorton and Miles Platting, Manchester.

The United Excelsior Mines, Limited.—This Company has been formed to acquire 900 gold claims in Mashonaland, British South Africa. The capital is fixed at £250,000 in £1 shares.

It is stated that the requisite capital has been privately subscribed. This is lucky for the promoters, as in the present uncertain state of affairs in South Africa there would not be much chance of their getting it from the public.

China and Glass. — Messrs. Goode, Artists and Designers, solicit an inspection of their collection in their recently-extended South Audley-street premises, now by far the largest and most important in Europe. Messrs. Goode guarantee the excellence of all their productions, and invite a comparison of their prices with those of any co-operative stores.

Operating across the Border.

It is interesting to note that London outside brokers are now extending their operations across the Border. A correspondent sends me some advertisements which recently appeared in the columns of the North British Advertiser, of Edinburgh, one of which refers to the London Equitable Exchange, stock and share brokers and dealers and investment advisers, 18, Eldon-street, London, E.C. They advertise their "investment, cover, deposit, three-monthly, and special operations," which they maintain is "the only safe way of making profits on the London Stock Exchange." It is hardly necessary to impress upon my canny Scot friends that this is not the only safe way of making profits; but, on the contrary, a certain way of losing one's money, and under the circumstances I must consider the address of this concern, "Elopement, London," as very significant. Another advertisement in the North British Advertiser emanates from the Prudential Bank of London, capital £150,000, which offers advances on bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other securities. It also invites cash deposits at rates of interest varying from 6 to 10 per cent. per annum. It is, perhaps, needless to remind my readers across the Border that the Prudential Bank of London, the offices of which are stated to be at Finsbury-circus Buildings, London, E.C., does not rank with the leading London banking institutions, and that deposits with it are therefore not quite so safe as money deposited, say, with the London and Westminster or Union Banks.

The Foreign Lottery Nuisance.

I have been asked by numerous readers of Truth to comment upon the German lottery nuisance. Some of my correspondents are receiving these missives two or three times a week, and they maintain that they quite spoil their breakfasts. These are mostly circulars from touts offering tickets in the great money lottery held under the guarantee of the Government of Hamburg; but there are also amongst others Brunswick and Vienna lotteries. The Hamburg touts have, however, been the most active of late. Now, I do not wish to imply that the Hamburg lottery is not carried on in a bonâ fide manner, but the great objection is that these tickets are taken through shady touts, whose chief endeavour is to get all the money they can from the foreigner, and to stick to the prizes whenever possible, for which they have an excellent opportunity, as the drawings are spread over a certain period. Add to this the fact that lotteries are illegal in this country, and it will be readily seen that the Englishman who gambles in them stands very little chance of getting a prize, and if he did draw one he would be unable to recover it according to British law. One of my correspondents specially mentions that several friends of his held winning numbers, but received no prizes, being put off with the excuse that some one else had already produced those numbers. I certainly advise my readers to give these touts, who are trading on the gambling propensities of the Britisher, a wide berth.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

J. R. X.—I certainly think that if Spanish go to the price you name they would be a fair purchase. That is really the quotation to which Greeks dropped, and Spanish on their merits are better than Greeks any day. F. E. S.—There is every prospect of the United States coming off victorious, and I should think that it would be advisable not to sell now. S. E. C.—1. Uruguay Bonds should be held. 2. No reason to sell Argentine Railway stocks now. You might rather consider the question of making an investment at the present level. R. P.—Hold Mexican Sixes, and disregard the talk about Mexico joining in the Spanish-American war.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

Hill-street.—You must tell me what kind of investment you require. Novice, Maidstone.—As a matter of principle I do not supply information about stockbrokers. Emma.—1. No; Government annuities are bought through the Post Office. 2. No. 3. I do not think there will be such a limit. 4. London and Liverpool and Globe, Northern Insurance, Sun Life, Scottish Widows' Fund, and Provident Life Office. Paolo.—Banking shares of this kind are promising, as the higher rates of interest current will increase profits. Rosario.—No reason to sell Bank of England stocks. The Central Institution is doing well, and is now following a progressive policy. Unfortunate Shareholder.—I have repeatedly commented upon the disgraceful working of the National Bank of Wales. Unfortunately, there is no limit to the time in which the liquidator must complete the winding-up. As you say, three of the directors were a short time ago sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. If two of these were, as you state, permitted to retire some time ago from the Third Battalion of the Welsh Regiment retaining their rank, I should think that their subsequent conviction would nullify this.

Home Rails.

T. W. L.—1. This is a bad time for selling railway stocks such as Taff Vale, and I think it would be better to hold. 2. As a reorganisation of the Baltimore and Ohio is to be carried out shortly, my advice is to hold. Flora.—Hold your Dover "A" and Coras, and rather add to them than otherwise. Rampollo.—Great Central 1894 Ordinary should be picked up as a promising "lock-up," also Metropolitan Districts.

American and Foreign Rails.

Santa Fe.—There is nothing new in this matter. A Widow.—It is impossible to obtain any reliable information as to whether Brazil will maintain her payments, and you must really take your own course. I never advised purchase of this Brazilian Railway stock. G.W.—No reason to sell Mexican Central Gold Bonds now. Jumbo.—Nothing about the terms of the assessment is settled yet. Bushmills.—Yes, the bonds Nos. 1 and 2 are gilt-edged and promising. 3. Both can be bought on the London Stock Exchange. Nos. 4 and 9 are good second-class. P.O.—Yes, Canadian Pacifics are a most promising investment, and any protraction of the Spanish-American War would bring them large traffic additions. Alfonso.—If you want to speculate in American Rails go for short turns, buy when the market is flat, and sell when it is strong. Always select shares for which there is a large market, such as Milwaukee, Louisville, Union Pacifics, &c.

Mining Shares.

Xmas.—It is quite true that this is a most disappointing property, and I must really leave you to take your own decision in the matter. Anxious, Bilston.—No option but to hold until the Mining market returns to its normal condition. Loch Creran.—1. Not just now. 2. Yes. 3. Londonderry are preferable. A. W., Chelsea.—It is quite correct. Two crushing returns came to hand during the same week, the first being for the whole of March, the second for a portion of April. Florence.—The returns of this Australian Mine are somewhat uncertain, but if you are a holder you should keep the shares. A. F.—Do not allow yourself to be frightened by "Bear" raids, and buy as many as you can afford to take up of Ivanhoe, Lady Shenton, and Florence. This is the investor's opportunity. A. McR.—I do not see how I can help you. The mines in question (in Rhodesia) have now been floated into Companies here, and your friend should employ some agent in Bulawayo to make inquiries. Perhaps if he wrote to the Secretary of the British Chartered Company they would obtain some information for him. G. C.—I will try to obtain some information such as you desire. The melancholy death of the late Mr. Woolf Joel has, unfortunately, interrupted all these matters. Sceptic—You must be aware that I condemned the Sapphire and Ruby Company of Montana from its inception. Why do you not apply to the liquidator? Personally, I do not think that anything will come of it. Spalding.—Glen Deeps may be worth purchasing, but I should prefer Goldfields Deep to the others. W. T., Bradford.—I do not think much of the Mining shares Nos. 1-3, and think you could do much better in Randfontein, Glencairn, Lady Shenton, and Ivanhoe. T. L., Cork.—There is no market for either of these shares. Slump.—Certainly hold the shares Nos. 1-3; this is not the time to sell. Anxious, Stockport.—As soon as certain matters are settled a rise is expected. Hold. I will tell you when to buy more. Nodrog.—The present settlement will decide the matter about which you inquire. Ivan.—Certainly hold British America Corporation, and buy more to average if you can afford to do so. Dunedin.—1. A special settlement of the British America Corporation is expected by the end of May. You cannot obtain any earlier settlement. The Company is stated to be doing well. 2. I do not think well of this concern. J. P.—You must be aware that sharp "Bear" attacks have been made upon West Australian shares, including London Globe Finance, and the price has since risen considerably above that mentioned in your telegram. Hold for a rise. C. S.—After recent events I have not much confidence in this mine and the men connected with it, yet the reports seem all very favourable. I am doubtful as to what course you should pursue.

London and Paris Exchange, Ltd., 24, Throgmorton-street, London, E.C. This Corporation is prepared to make Advances on Mining Shares, at 6 per cent. per annum, subject to a deposit of 20 per cent. Clients by this system save the heavy contangoes usually charged.

Industrial Shares.

Exe.—The issue was very badly subscribed, and I do not advise a purchase. Country Cousin.—Paquin Ordinary are a fair purchase at present price, and there is no reason to sell Lyons now. S. McW.—I cannot reply by letter. While the shares in question are not a bad investment, it might be as well for you to clear your profit. Madrasi.—I have no information about this concern, and do not think favourably of it. Caragh.—No, I cannot advise you to sell these shares after the heavy fall. Better wait. B. O. D.—I cannot give you any reason of the continual delay in the payment on the Preference shares of Clement, Gladiator, and Humber (France) except the state of collapse of the cycle market. Cyclist.—1. Hold for a recovery. 2. I have always expressed an unfavourable opinion respecting Simpson's Lever Chains, and I expect no improvement. A. C. P.—1. No market in London. 2 Sell if you can. 3. No. Mrs. M. A. L.—I am sorry to say that I cannot help you much in this matter. Holland & Co., Limited, distillers, was formed in 1887, the authorised capital being £250,000, in shares of £10 each—£100,000 Seven per Cent. Cumulative Preferred, and £120,000 Ordinary, with power to issue debentures for £100,000. The vendor surrendered a considerable number of Ordinary and Preferred shares and debentures in 1889-91, but the undertaking has never been brought to a profit-earning basis. For four years only the debenture interest was paid, and it is reported that during recent years the bulk of the profits has been applied against bad debts. The management appears to be bad, and I regret to say that there is very little prospect for your Preferred shares, but you should certainly not agree to any such arrangement as has now been proposed to you.

Mixed Investments.

B. R., Todmorden.—I cannot recommend individual stockbrokers, and you had better act through your former channels. I do not think there is much money to be made by speculation in the various Industrials Nos. 1 to 5, and amongst the mines Nos. 7, 10, and 17 are the most promising. City W.—1. I certainly advise you to keep your Great Central Prefs. now. 2. No reason to sell these shares. 3. London and South-Western (a) are at present being subjected to forced realisations, and it would be better to wait until these have been concluded. I should prefer B just now. Constant Reader, Eastbourne.—Your investments are so widely distributed that they are not affected to any extent by the war. Hold Nos. 1-7 The Industrial shares No. 8 are high enough. No option but to hold No. 9. I do not hold a very high opinion of the shares Nos. 10 and 11, or of Nos 13-15. No reason to sell Nos. 16 and 17. E.N.—Yes, the Industrial shares No. 1 are worth holding. I do not consider No. 2 promising. Certainly hold the Chinese Loan (3). No reason to sell Hannan's Props. or Randfontein (4 and 5). Hold Woodstock Transvaal (6). No option but to keep No. 7. As regards the war its effect upon stocks like No. 8. is passing away. Denbigh—1. Why not take your handsome profit in these Industrial shares. 2. Amongst mines, I think that Rand Mines, East Rands, Randfontein, Lady Shenton, Ivanhoe, and London and Globe Finance would make up a good private Trust. A Widow.—Yes, there is a price for Rhymney Iron Ordinary shares, which are quoted 1⅜-1⅝. Yes, Canadian Pacifics, De Beers and Buenos Ayres Great Southern are worth buying.

A Chapter on Industrial Stocks.

The market for Industrial shares has not been exempt from the effects of the slump which came over the Stock Exchange on Thursday and Friday. In fact, at one time on Friday some of the leading Industrial shares were extremely difficult to sell, and buyers were altogether absent. Fears of dear money, on the war scare, of course, chiefly account for the weakness, but it has to be considered too that an excessive number of flotations have been made, in many cases with hugely inflated capitals, so that bad times take more effect upon this department than on others. A sharp spasm was experienced by Welsbach, amongst which the Ordinary stock at one time dropped considerably below par, although finally a rally took place to 107½, while the Preferred were quoted 96½, the Deferred 19s., after considerably lower prices had been current. Of course, the fact that the settlement had been fixed for as early as May 5 was a disagreeable revelation to the "Bull" speculators, and was, no doubt, in part responsible for the promiscuous selling. Hudson's Bay shares have been very weak of late, and a fresh drop to 19¼ has occurred. Oil shares have been fairly steady, Russian Petroleum at 23½ for the Ordinary and 10½ for the Preferred, while Schibaieff were dull at $\frac{1}{16}$ premium. The dividend on Schweppe Deferred at the rate of 2 per cent. only was considered very disappointing, and the Ordinary fell to 22s. 6d., the Preferred to 22s. 6d., the Deferred to 8s. Bovrils have been dull, the Ordinary at $\frac{15}{16}$, the Deferred at ⅝. Lyons have displayed weakness, and dropped below 4, notwithstanding the "Bull" points about the Crystal Palace restaurant and the Throgmorton-street premises. Apollinaris have been quite neglected, a set-back to 11½ taking place, while Pears Ordinary are quiet at 1½. Bryant & May have also been the turn easier at 19¾, and Coats have been sold very heavily from Glasgow, the Ordinary receding at one time to 52¾, from which there has been a recovery to 56. As to English Sewing Cotton (Threads) these have now fallen to ⅜ premium, while the premium on the Prefs. is quite nominal at 1s. The various Westralian timber shares have eased off, Millars to 3⅛, Davies to 1⅜. The prospectuses of the new Companies, of which there are three, dealing with West Australian timber, are being kept for better times, especially as the Millars Karri dividend, at the rate of 20 per cent, proved disappointing to the sanguine ones. Cycle shares have moved very irregularly, but a little more activity was displayed. Dunlops have further given way, the Ordinary to 13s.; the Deferred to 7s. 3d. The extraordinary slipping-away in the price of Dunlop Deferred is attracting a great deal of attention, and people are asking whether the insiders are clearing out. It seems to me quite time that those prominently connected with the Company should make a clear statement as to the reasons for this heavy decline, and the real position of the concern. Humbers have been stagnant at 12s. 3d. for the Ordinary, and 7s. for the Extensions. Cycle Components are unaltered at 1¼, while Swifts are firmer at 12s. Singers, however, are easier at 11s., and Amalgamated Tyres are down to 5s. Amongst Brewery shares Allsopp Ordinary have shown weakness at 145 xd, but amongst the substantial Preference and Ordinary brewery stocks, suitable for investment, there has been a fair business. Yardley Prefs. at 5 have been in some request, and the Ordinary stock has also been dealt in. Septimus Parsonage & Co.'s Ordinary shares are now quoted at a premium on the proceedings at the meeting of shareholders, at which Mr. Joseph Barker, J.P., the Chairman, announced a further dividend, making 8 per cent. for the year 1897, after placing £4,000 to reserve, and carrying forward £2,567. It is the directors' intention to issue at an early date the balance of the unallotted shares at a premium; and, with such capital, pay the vendors the amount still due to them on the purchase price, provide ample working capital for the Highland Eske Distillery now approaching completion—which will be one of the most modern and best-equipped distilleries in Scotland; and, with the balance, further develop the Company's business. This Company owns, amongst other monopolies, that of Theophile Roederer & Co.'s Champagne, and Max Greger & Co.'s Hungarian Wines. I have repeatedly advised my readers not to have anything to do with Norton & Co., Limited, who acquired, some eighteen months ago, a furniture and cabinet-manufacturer's business, with offices at 19, Corporation-street, Birmingham. Those who cleared out of the shares when I advised them to do so will be able to congratulate themselves, as the proceedings at the first annual meeting, held on Saturday, show that the position is by no means satisfactory. Amongst the minor points raised was the fact that the Company had had six successive secretaries. Mr. Thompson, one of the shareholders, maintained that, while in the prospectus they were led to expect a profit of £9,600, they found as a result of the first year's working a doubtful profit of between £3,000 and £4,000. In the end an advisory committee was appointed to examine and inquire into the affairs of the Company, and submit a report to the shareholders, which should be of considerable interest. With reference to a remark which I made about Fish Oil shares a correspondent, who is evidently a supporter of the concern, wishes to make it clear to me that through the reconstruction of the Company five of the present new shares, which stand at 6½ each, are equal to one old share. This, after all, still shows a considerable decline on the boom price of 37½, and, personally, I should be sorry to hold the new shares even at their present reduced level. A correspondent sends me some circulars which he has received from Mr. A. E. Ward, 30, Moorgate-street, E.C., in which this gentleman, as the promoter of a syndicate, invites subscriptions for the purpose of forming "a parent company for the acquirement and extension of the business of Messrs. R. A. Smith & Co., investment, insurance, and financial agents, established 1889, in Old Broad-street, London, E.C." I wonder where these conversions into Companies are going to end?—Your affectionate uncle, MOSES.

QUEER STORY.

THE CHAIRMAN OF CROWDIES'.

WHEN his numerous City acquaintances heard that Sir Jahnbock Crowdie, that most hard-headed of men, had fallen in love with—and was, in fact, engaged to—Miss Dorothy Rampion, they received the intelligence with smiles of amused wonder. Miss Rampion was not only thirty years Sir Jahnbock's junior, but she was the demure and extremely religious daughter of that well-known Nonconformist preacher, who holds forth every Sabbath-day at the Finsbury Tabernacle, and enunciates the most severe views on all moral and social questions of any preacher in London.

"Fancy a typical City man like Sir Jahnbock bestowing his affections in such a quarter" (such were the prevailing comments); "a fellow who's been wedded to money-making all his life, and never cared a twopenny damn for religion!"

"The girl is pretty, of course?" "Deuced pretty, but frightfully pious." "Don't you believe it; she's wickeder than she looks—all those little Quakeresses are!" "I thought at one time that Sir Jahnbock's young cousin, Tom, would have cut him out in that quarter." "Never had a chance; the girl is under the papa's thumb, and his reverence considered Tom much too frivolous." "Tom is a gay dog, to be sure; but he is by no means the mere dilettante man of pleasure that many people fancy him." "No?" "I can assure you that, behind his lounging and lazy exterior, he conceals as shrewd a business intelligence as any man in the City." "In amatorial shrewdness, at any rate, he is behind Sir Jahnbock." "How do you mean?" "Why, Sir J. has had the nous to pretend to the little Quakeress and her papa that he has been converted and experienced the New Birth. That is what has won him the day there," &c. Loud guffaws greeted this statement. To those who knew him in business, the mere notion of Sir Jahnbock's having experienced the new birth was too exquisitely absurd.

Sir Jahnbock Crowdie, as every one knows, was (and is still, for that matter) Chairman of Crowdies', Limited. Crowdies' is a private Company, with, perhaps, the largest wholesale leather and saddlery business in London. At the time of which we write they had not long gone Limited. The sole management, however, still remained in the same hands; two or three dummy shareholders being brought in, to comply with the requirements of the Act. In fact, the directors, four in number, held all the shares themselves, except three, and ran the new Company just as completely as they had done the old firm.

These four directors were Sir Jahnbock Crowdie, his brother, Peter Crowdie, his cousin, Tom Crowdie, and a gentleman named Perkins, who was very much under strong-minded Sir Jahnbock's influence, and always voted, at Board meetings, as the latter told him.

Now, wealthy as the Company was, and large as were the dividends which it brought in annually, it was somewhat grasping in its financial dealings, and was by no means in the habit of being liberal to those whom it employed to do its work. To its solicitors, Messrs. Cobling & Co., it had been particularly niggardly; so much so, that a squabble had arisen, which resulted in the said solicitors throwing up all Crowdies' work. Nor was that the end of it, for very bad blood, in private and personal relations, was at the same time excited between Sir Jahnbock and Mr. Cobling, the head of the solicitorial firm. This latter gentleman had a caustic tongue, and, when he was annoyed, made no bones about using it. He now uttered some particularly pungent remarks about Sir Jahnbock, which, coming to the ears of the Chairman of Crowdies', as they were meant to do, rankled in his bosom exceedingly. He affected to despise them, indeed; but he did not forget them, and he determined, if he ever had the opportunity, to make Mr. Cobling smart.

One morning, about this time, Tom Crowdie happened to stroll into Sir Jahnbock's office for a chat with his chief. Tom was a young fellow who was somewhat averse from desk-work, and generally allowed himself an easy or two in the course of the morning. Sir Jahnbock did not welcome him with much cordiality; for he did not relish having his time wasted by his frivolous co-director. But Tom was not easily put off, when he wanted to do a bit of gossiping; and he settled himself on the hearthrug, with his shoulders against the mantel-piece, and began to talk.

"I say, Jahnbock," he said, with a half-amused grin—it was one of Tom's failings that he could never take anything quite seriously—"I say, our friend Cobling has been indulging in some more spiteful remarks about us; about you, in particular."

"Has he?" snarled Sir Jahnbock, laying down his pen, and looking up. "What has he been saying now, Tom?"

"He has been exercising his facetious wit, I'm told, in throwing new lights on old phrases. He bet some feller at at the club that he'd give an exact definition of 'The Golden Mean,' in one word. When challenged, he answered, 'Crowdies'.' Confounded cheek—wasn't it?"

"If he doesn't look out, we'll make him repent it."

"And he went on to refer to the Chairman of Crowdies' as a niggardly nigger driver."

"Ha! I'll have a knock at him, yet."

"Do you know, Jahnbock," said Charles, beginning to chuckle, "I've thought of a way in which we might make Cobling sit up!"

"Have you? How?"

"Well, it's this way. It would only be for fun, of course. Just to give him a good fright and make him eat humble pie to us. I don't suggest that we should really go through with it. But last evening I happened, quite by chance, to be looking over our Memorandum and Articles."

"Yes?"

"And I noticed a rather remarkable omission."

"Indeed. What is that, pray?"

"Why, the usual clause authorising the Company to pay promotion expenses out of capital has not been inserted."

"Umph!. I had never observed that. But how can we use that as a handle against Cobling? Do you suggest that we should sue him for damages, on the ground that he has drawn our Articles imperfectly?"

"Oh, no! But, unless I am mistaken, he is liable to refund the Company something like three thou!"

"Pish, my dear fellow. How do you make that out?"

"Well, you see, Coblings' bill for promotion expenses was paid out of our capital. It amounted, as you are aware, to some three thousand odd. Now we had no right" (Tom chuckled) "to use the shareholders' money for that purpose. I believe we can, if we like, have the whole amount refunded."

"But how, Tom?"

"Well, suppose we get leave to tax the bill. Practically all of it would be bound to come off on taxation."

"Would it?"

"I do not see how it could be otherwise."

"But then," said Jahnbock, with a knowing shake of the head. "Even if it were disallowed as a payment out of capital, the money would still be due to Coblings'; and we should probably have to pay it out of our own pockets."

"I don't think so."

"Why not?"

"Because Coblings' bill is made out to the Company; and, in fact, all their transactions with us have been with us quâ Company, not quâ individuals. Of course, I might be wrong. But I don't think I am. At any rate, you can easily settle the point by taking legal advice."

"It seems inconceivable that smart City solicitors should have given themselves away so fatuously as you suggest."

"The smartest men are occasionally guilty of oversights," said Tom; "and it would be fun to give Cobling a good fright—wouldn't it?"

"Um," replied Sir Jahnbock, "that part of it would be all right enough—if it could be effected. You have raised an ingenious point, Tom; but I don't myself believe, for one moment, that it can be sustained. However," he added, "I shall be seeing Chatwells'" (naming the Company's new solicitors) "this afternoon. I'll ask them what they think about it."

"So do, Jahnbock, then. Ta-ta!"

And Tom lounged gracefully out of the chairman's office.

Next morning, on arriving late at business, as he usually did, Tom received a message from one of the clerks that Sir Jahnbock would like to see him. He repaired at once to the latter's office.

"Ha! Tom!" said the chairman, whose face wore an unusually excited expression, and who was evidently in his blandest humour, "I congratulate you, sir, upon your acute and profound knowledge of company law."

"Eh?" exclaimed Tom, grinning. "Chatwells' bore me out then—did they?"

"They did. I saw Chatwell himself. At first, he was rather taken aback by the point raised. Said he had never, in all his experience, come across a question of the kind before. Didn't see how we could make out a case. But on going into the matter and looking up the authorities, he changed his opinion altogether, and admitted that, if Coblings' bill were presented for taxation, the Master would be bound to disallow nearly the whole of it."

"Just so. And what did he say about our personal liability in the matter?"

"He advised me that, taking into account the manner in which the bill was drawn, we are under no personal liability to pay it; nor did he see that it could be charged against any other of the Company's funds."

"In fact, that if we chose to press the matter home, Coblings' would have to lose the money."

"Why do you say 'if'?" exclaimed Sir Jahnbock, with a keen, hasty glance at the younger man. "It would be absurd not to press the matter home, in my opinion."

"Eh!" cried Tom sharply, his expression undergoing a sudden change. "You don't mean that seriously, Jahnbock?"

"I do, though. Coblings' have been devilish nasty all along. We owe them no consideration. Why should we show them any?"

"But we do owe them the money."

"Bless us, my dear fellow, what a turneock—I mean weathercock—you are! You yourself were the first to suggest that we did not owe them the money, and Chatwells' have borne you out in your views. Now you veer round, and——"

"Rot!" interrupted Tom, with some warmth. "This isn't playing fair with me, Jahnbock. You know very well what my suggestion was—namely, that we should go just far enough to give Coblings' a good fright—for a lark, as I said—and make them eat humble pie; but I never proposed really to cheat them on purely technical grounds of money which they have fairly earned, and for which we are morally liable. It would be too beastly low."

Sir Jahnbock smiled.

"My dear Tom," he said, in a suave, withal bantering, tone, "it seems that you are disposed to introduce an altogether novel factor into City ethics. Legal liability we know, and limited liability we know; but moral liability!"

"I'm not more squeamish than other people," answered Tom. "But I like to play the game. And this isn't cricket, Jahnbock; not by any manner of means."

"Do you call it cricket," retorted Sir Jahnbock, sarcastically, "to suggest a bit of sharp practice to the captain of your side, for example, and then to blackguard him for proposing to act upon it?"

"I never suggested the sharp practice itself; I only suggested a pretence of it, to frighten the other side. You know that very well, Jahnbock!"

"My maxim is: 'When you get a chance to hit your enemy, hit him hard,'" said the other.

"Hard; yes! But above the belt," protested Tom.

"Hit him anywhere!" cried Sir Jahnbock, with a vindictive twinkle in his keen grey eyes.

* * * * *

The next board meeting of Crowdies' was a memorable one. Sir Jahnbock lost no time in raising the question of Coblings' account, about which he had already conferred with his brother and Perkins, and had assured himself of their support in the line he meant to take.

"It would seem to me, gentlemen," he said, with a queer side-way look at his cousin, "that having had this serious informality pointed out to us by our esteemed colleague, Thomas Crowdie, we, as responsible business men, have no option in the course to be pursued. The money has been improperly paid; and we must see that it is made good by those who committed the error."

"Most decidedly," said Peter Crowdie.

"Beyond a doubt," added the amenable Perkins.

"Gentlemen," protested Tom, with unwonted earnestness, "will you be good enough to let me say a few words? When I pointed out the informality in question to Sir Jahnbock, I never intended or supposed that it would result in this line of action being seriously adopted. My suggestion (as Sir Jahnbock is well aware) was that we should go just far enough to frighten Coblings' into apologising for their rude and hostile behaviour towards us. In fact, I wanted to play a sort of practical joke upon them. But any proposal to press the matter against them, and to make them refund money which virtually, if not technically, belongs to them, and for which they have given a full equivalent in work and disbursements, I shall most strenuously oppose."

The chairman, confident of his majority, smiled a superior, and rather irritating, smile at Tom.

"The matter is in your hands, gentlemen," he said, with a shrug of his shoulders. "You will, of course, decide as you think best. I, for my part, am bound to say that my cousin Thomas's proposal to go only far enough with the matter to frighten Coblings'—a sort of practical joke, as he put it—seems to me both puerile and fatuous. Puerile, because it is unworthy of intelligent business men; fatuous, because we should thereby bar ourselves from any future remedy. Supposing, for instance, any of the shares now held by us were to pass, either by death or sale, into other hands. It would be competent for the new shareholder to insist on the deficiency in our capital being made up, and we should then have to do it out of our own pockets. For, having once commenced proceedings against Coblings' and dropped them, it would be practically impossible ever to proceed against them in the same matter again."

"Quite so," assented Peter Crowdie.

"Hear, hear!" cried Perkins, drumming a fat fist on the table.

"Well, gentlemen," pursued Sir Jahnbock, "I do not think that anything is to be gained by further discussion. The resolution before the Board is: That the Company's solicitors be instructed to take the necessary steps to tax Messrs. Coblings' account—improperly paid out of the Company's capital—without delay. Those in favour?" (Peter Crowdie and Perkins each held up a hand). "Will you withdraw your opposition, Cousin Thomas?" asked the Chairman, banteringly.

"No, I will not!" cried out the young man, hotly. "I protest against the action of the Board; I assert that it is a piece of flagrant dishonesty. And I insist" (turning to the secretary) "that my protest be recorded on the minutes."

"As you please," said Sir Jahnbock. "But it will do no earthly good, you know."

"Not a ha'porth," added Peter.

"It will show that I refuse to identify myself with a disgraceful swindle," exclaimed Tom, who was clearly in a great state of wrath and indignation. "And I wish to Heaven I'd never been fool enough to point out this flaw to you at all."

"It is too late to wish that now," replied Sir Jahnboch, smiling maliciously at his fiery young cousin. "Gentlemen, the resolution is carried, with one dissentient."

No time was lost in putting the Board's resolution into effect; and the result of their proceedings against their late solicitors was all that even the vindictive Sir Jahnbock himself could desire. The taxing-master, before whom the matter came, found himself obliged—though with obvious reluctance—to sustain Crowdies' objection, and to disallow nearly the whole account. In fact, out of a total of £3,400, only £250 was allowed to stand. Cobling was in a state of positive frenzy, as well he might be. Sir Jahnbock enjoyed his malicious triumph to the utmost. But it was short-lived, after all. For at the same Board meeting at which the complete discomfiture of Coblings' was announced, a further announcement was made, which, so to speak, took all the taste out of the other.

Tom Crowdie made it.

"Gentlemen," he said, quietly addressing the Board at large, though his eyes were fixed on the chairman, "you may as well know that Coblings' have lost nothing by these scandalous proceedings. I feel that, in a sense, I am responsible; and I am standing the damage. I have this morning handed to our late solicitors my private cheque for £3,150!"

"You have?" cried Sir Jahnbock, starting up in a rage.

"I have," said Tom, smiling.

"Then, by Tartarus!" stormed the other, oblivious of all etiquette in his wrath and mortification, "you're the damnedest idiot that ever disgraced a Board!"

* * * * *

"Don't, Tom, don't. I'm not engaged to you yet you know."

Miss Dorothy Rampion, daughter of the Rev. Silas Rampion, was the speaker.

"All right, Doll! But you are as good as engaged to me, you know; we're only waiting for the sake of appearances."

And the audacious Tom Crowdie made no sign of removing his arm from her shapely waist.

"I'm afraid it's no good talking to you, Tom," she said, with a resigned little sigh, "you're full of the old Adam."

"Choke full," admitted Tom, with undiminished cheerfulness. "Bubbling over with that ancient Johnny, dontcherknow. You don't want me to sham the New Birth, as Sir J. did, do you? By the way, was he awfully sick when you gave him his congé?"

"Indeed, he was; but papa insisted. When those articles about your company were published in the Microscope, papa was quite in a fury of indignation. He said that Sir Jahnbock should never speak to me again. Of course I had to obey papa, and——"

"Sly little puss! Of course you never told your father that——"

"Hush! hush! Tom. Don't speak of it. If papa ever were to find out, I——"

"He never shall find out, Doll. No one knows the truth, except you and me."

"It has been dreadfully wicked of us both. Of—of you to do it; and of me to consent."

"Has it? I demur, Miss Dorothy. Seeing that you loved me from the first, and that I loved you to distraction; seeing, also, that your father favoured that hypocritical Jahnbock, and that you were afraid to go against his wishes; seeing, in fact, that the happiness of a most deserving young man and a most angelic young woman were at stake, I dared a Machiavellian scheme (founded on a most extraordinary, though opportune, flaw in our Articles) for discrediting Jahnbock and crediting myself in your father's eyes. For my part, I think that it has been rather a virtuous act, and that success has declared on the side of those who thoroughly deserve it."

"It has cost you a huge sum of money, Tom."

"Ah! Doll darling, I have not told you this; and, of course, you will not breathe a word. The truth is that I compounded with Coblings'. They saw that they were in for a heavy loss, and they were glad enough to take from me 5s. in the £ on what they had dropped, and to do me, in return, the little favour I had requested."

"What favour, Tom?"

"Why, to allow me to hand them my cheque for the whole sum, £3,150—so that my banking account would bear out my supposed generosity, in case of any investigation arising—and to hand me in return cash for £2,362 10s. Therefore, you see, Doll ——"

"Then," she interposed, pouting, and suddenly falling into an ill-used tone, that, in the circumstances, was truly feminine, "you—you—only—sacrificed for my sake—a quarter of what I thought. In—in—fact, you compounded for me at 5s. in the £. I suppose you didn't think me worth more?"

"On the contrary, Doll," replied Tom. "I think you worth untold millions. But I compounded with Coblings' in order to have the more to spend on you. With part of that £2,362 10s. I shall furnish for you the prettiest little house that ever was furnished. With part we will enjoy the sweetest honeymoon that ever was enjoyed. And with the rest," concluded Tom, producing a little leather case from his waistcoat pocket, "I have bought this."

She took the case and opened it. As she saw the contents, her eyes sparkled and her face flushed with delight.

"Oh!" she gasped, "Oh! what splendid diamonds! I—I—Oh! Tom! Tom!"

"You like them, pet?"

She did not answer him directly. But, laying her head upon his shoulder, and looking demurely downwards, she whispered, just audibly,

"I'm glad you compounded, Tom!"

ART NOTES.

THE NEW GALLERY.

THE private view at the New Gallery was on Saturday, and Saturday, as it happens, was St. George's Day. Now, by a curious coincidence, it is a large upright canvas purporting to represent St. George that is Sir Edward Burne-Jones's chief contribution to the exhibition and, as such, hung in the place of honour in the West Room. Our patron saint has been painted a good many times, but never before, I venture to say, has he been so cruelly misrepresented as in Sir Edward's picture of him. This feeble-looking, woe-begone, anæmic, knock-kneed warrior the patron saint of "Merrie England" forsooth? Go to! He is not even a worthy representative of the "Greenery-Yallery, Grosvenor-Gallery, foot-in-the-grave" young men of whom we used to see and hear too much a decade or so ago. This lank and haggard martyr to dyspepsia and melancholy the gallant Cappodocian adventurer who slew the Lybian dragon and rescued a beautiful maiden, quotha? Why, at best, he is but a lily-lunching mediæval Maudle masquerading in studio armour, a prehistoric Postlethwaite who has not pluck and determination enough even to "live up to" a blue china teapot! No, no, Sir Edward, emphatically this St. George of yours will not do. As was once observed by the Lady Saphir in a well-remembered comic opera: "He is not Empyrean; he is not Della Cruscan; he is not even Early English!" You might have called him "St. Epicene," or "St. Spavin," or "St. Vitus," and one would have been ready to accept your picture as "a motive for mural adornment of the higher class"; but by dubbing him "St. George" you call forth the latent Philistinism which lurks in the breasts of even the most æsthetic and devoted of your admirers, and make them forget the excellencies of your armour in the pallid and morbid unwholesomeness of your man.

But if Sir Edward Burne-Jones falls below his usual level in the present exhibition, the veteran Mr. G. F. Watts surely rises above his in the delightful picture entitled "Early Spring," which hangs on the south wall of the West Room. It is long since Mr. Watts has given us anything so truly delightful, so exquisitely charming, as this picture of a sturdy little boy of five or six standing barefoot in the lush grass with his hand full of the blossoms of spring. As the work of an octogenarian artist it is simply marvellous in its freshness and vigour. Rarely have the innocence, the wonderment, the fascination of childhood been more masterfully expressed upon canvas It is, indeed, difficult to think that the artist who has painted this masterpiece is also answerable for the curious and enigmatic jumble represented in his picture hung at the other end of the same room, and catalogued as "Can these Bones Live?" I scrutinised this puzzling composition with considerable care, but wholly failed to make out what the artist means by his curious medley of skulls, old rags and bones, cog-wheels, empty goblets, workmen's tools, and all the rest of it. There is also a half-obliterated inscription on the trunk of a tree which only makes the mystery the more maddening. No doubt it is meant as a painted homily, and may be full of deep allegorical meaning, but, oh! the pity of it that an artist who can paint such a picture of childhood as "Early Spring" should waste his time and talent over the purposeless obscurity and intricate symbolism of such canvases as "Can these Bones Live?"

Need I say that there are several portraits by Mr. John S. Sargent at the New Gallery? Visitors have learned to expect these as a matter of course. The place of honour in the North Room, which Mr Sargent has filled for several successive seasons, is occupied this spring by his portrait of Mrs. Thursby. In this picture the artist has adopted what is with him a very frequent custom, and has painted his subject at a moment of arrested action. As you look at the lady, she seems in the act of rising from the arm-chair in which she is sitting. With one foot she has pushed away the footstool she has been using, and her lips are parted, as though she were greeting the guest she is apparently advancing to welcome. The term "a speaking likeness" is invested with a new meaning as we look at her. The portrait is a veritable tour de force, painted with that rapid yet unerring decision which the spectator feels must be characteristic of Mr. Sargent's method. That it will be popular with the public is certain. I am not at all sure, however, that there is not better work in his portrait of Mrs. Anstruther Thomson, which is hung in a corner of the same room. But there is another portrait on the wall of the North Room, which I predict will be more talked about than any of Mr. John S. Sargent's. It is quite true that the talk about it is not likely to be complimentary, but that Mr. Arthur Melville has achieved a tremendous succès pour rire for his large portrait, numbered 207 in the catalogue, is already past all "possible doubt whatever." It is, perhaps, the most astounding piece of portraiture ever exhibited in a public exhibition. At a little distance it looked to me like a life-size pattern for a patchwork counterpane, or what is, I believe, known as a crazy quilt. Seen closer, it resolved itself into a vast grey crinoline surmounted by—but, no! Silence in such a case is the best as well as the kindest policy. But perhaps one may be allowed to sympathise, in all sincerity, with the lady who has been thus pilloried; and to wonder, too, whether a case for the issue of a legal injunction against the further exhibition of this astonishing feat of "modernity" in portraiture might not even now be obtained.

Mrs. Adrian Stokes's picture of "Aucassin and Nicolette" is as apropos as it is charming. A year ago it would have needed detailed explanation, but now, thanks to the prolific Mr. Andrew Lang's translation of the original romance and to Mr. Le Gallienne's allusion to it in his "Quest of the Golden Girl," most of us know enough about the history of this quaint old thirteenth-century love affair to appreciate Mrs. Stokes's pictorial rendering of one of its most touching incidents. She shows us with a naïve simplicity that is in all ways suitable the faithful Aucassin folding his fair Nicolette in his arms at last beneath the trees of a frankly decorative forest. The picture is happily inspired, and is painted with much skill, both as to its design and its technique. Mr. Adrian Stokes, with a result that cannot be considered quite so happy, has apparently laid the scene of his picture in the same forest. But his mail-clad knight kneeling in prayer before a crucifix nailed to a tree is not very convincing or impressive. Somehow or another one does not believe in him as one believes in Mrs. Stokes's mediæval lovers a yard or so away. Near to her picture will be found a small but brilliantly painted portrait of Lady Waterlow, by Mr. Alma Tadema, R.A. It is his only contribution to the New Gallery, and should therefore be appreciated all the more. M. Fernand Khnopff grows more and more cryptic in his paintings. I defy even a practised solver of double acrostics to guess what "Une Aile Bleue" really means. In the foreground of the picture is a white marble bust of a woman with one ear tolerably normal in size and shape, but the other developed into a hideous sort of flap which is suggestive of the necessity of an immediate visit to an aural surgeon rather than of any more recondite meaning. The lady in the background, who apparently has a blue mouth, only serves to make the mystery more insoluble. Equally cryptic, but much better painted, is M. Khnopff's other symbolic picture which he calls "L'Encens."

Yet another version of the Perseus and Andromeda myth has been attempted by Mr. Herbert J. Draper. The only novelty he has introduced into the treatment is the clothing of Andromeda in a vesture apparently made of rusty sheet-iron and her endowment with a fine head of tow hair. I am getting rather tired of those Arcadian pictures in which beautiful Chloes and Daphnes wander about weaving garlands of flowers and putting their arms round the necks of unnaturally clean cows. So, I am afraid, I fail to appreciate the charm of the innocent damsels who are embracing a number of idyllic calves in Mr. George Wetherbee's "Spring Phantasy." Moreover, it seems to me that the said calves are of an Arcadian breed that would be promptly disqualified if entered for exhibition at the Agricultural Hall Cattle Show. For some seasons, too, our picture exhibitions have been rather overdone with what I may call "Bathing Idylls." Possibly it may be a tribute to the pervading influence of that very smart institution, "The Bath Club," in Dover-street; but at all events there has been quite an epidemic of late of pictures in which nude nymphs and naiads are seen engaged in paddling in secluded pools, or taking al fresco dips in lily-starred backwaters in defiance of the by-laws. The New Gallery is this year full of sad pictures. Look at Mr. Alfred Withers's "Woodland Pool," for example, Mr. Frank Spenlove-Spenlove's "Seclusion," Mr. Leslie Thomson's "Arcadia," and Mr. Alfred East's "Mystic Pool." Even Mrs. H. M. Stanley has thought it well to be in the fashion, and so gives us, instead of one of her delightful glimpses of street-arab life, a study of the conventional nude model taking a bath in that highly inconvenient and uncomfortable way which is supposed to be general in Arcadia. My notes of other notable pictures must be reserved for a future article; but I cannot close this one without calling attention to the two glowing landscapes by Mr. Edward Stott in the South Room. "The Watering Place" and "The Gleaners," as they are called, are steeped in air and bathed in light. It would seem, indeed, that Mr. Stott has found it hard to decide between the claims made on his artistic discipleship by Claude Monet and George Mason, and, by way of "compromise," has shown himself a follower of them both.

MUSIC.

THE NEW OPERA SEASON.

EVERYTHING seems now prepared for the opening on Monday week of the new season of the Royal Opera, which for the second time will be under the direction of Earl de Grey, Messrs. Grau, Faber, and Higgins. Mr. J. H. Mapleson likewise hopes to open the New Olympic Theatre on Monday, May 23, the day before the Queen's birthday, when it may be recollected the projected "Imperial Opera House," which died stillborn, was to have been inaugurated two years ago on the Pall Mall site adjacent to the new Her Majesty's Theatre. That scheme was preceded by an equally abortive enterprise on the Thames Embankment, but after Titiens had laid the "first brick" and the Duke of Coburg the "first stone," the eligible building site became a police station. The more modest and promising scheme of the "New Italian Opera Syndicate," with a capital of £30,000, the signatories being Messrs. P. Purvis, J. W. H. Williams, and J. H. Mapleson, gentlemen; Mr. A. Blake, wine merchant; Mr. D. W. Pentecost, restaurateur; Mr. H. Wilson, merchant; and Mr. J. S. Fleming, secretary, was registered on the 4th inst. Mr. Mapleson's plans are, I believe, not yet perfected, but he has recently been travelling in Italy, where I am told he has made several engagements, among others that of the band and chorus which have been associated with Signor Sonzogno's Italian operatic enterprise in Milan during the past winter. The Covent Garden scheme is now becoming so thoroughly French and German, that there may possibly be an opening for genuine Italian opera, always providing that an adequate company and an interesting repertory can be secured. Mr. Mapleson's scheme, it is understood, provides for opera at half cost, or, in other words, all the seats except the private boxes are to be sold at the prices usually charged for ordinary theatrical entertainments.

The interest in the season of the Royal Opera, which commences at Covent Garden on May 9, will lie partly in the artists, partly in the "Nibelungen" cyclus. There are to be three cycles of the "Ring" with many of the Bayreuth vocalists under Mottl's conductorship. The available seats — only 600 seats per night, I believe, were available, although it has since been resolved to number and reserve the gallery — were sold out long ago, but the librarians have, of course, subscribed for other tickets, which doubtless will be sold at a considerable premium. Also it would not surprise me if some of the subscribers to the Royal Opera placed their boxes at the disposal of the public after one experience of sitting in a darkened theatre listening to the Meister's hypnotic music from four o'clock in the afternoon till eleven at night. With Mottl at the conductor's desk, Herr Pöhlig, of Bayreuth and Hamburg, behind the scenes, and Frau Cosima Wagner looking on approvingly from the stalls, "Der Ring des Nibelungen" will probably be given in a manner thoroughly satisfactory to the most ardent Wagnerite.

To those who cannot pretend to be of the Elect, the ordinary repertory at Covent Garden will probably be of even superior interest to the four-day tetralogy. The Royal Opera Syndicate have not again fallen into the mistake—if mistake it be—of dispensing with the services of eminent prime donne. Indeed, the list of artists this year is stronger, perhaps, than we have had for a good many years past. It includes the following vocalists:—

Sopranos and contraltos: Mesdames Calvé, Eames, Nordica, Melba, Ternina, Héglon, Ella Russell, De Lussan, Von Artner, Adams, Gadsky, Reid, Rondés, Frances Saville, Thiery, Lowentz, Dugazon, Brema, Meisslinger, Bauermeister, and Schumann-Heinck. Tenors: MM. Jean de Reszke, Van Dyck, Saléza, Dippel, Bonnard, Simon, Cazeneuve, Vanni, and Breuer. Baritones: MM. Defries, Renaud, Albers, Dufriche, Van Rooy, Dufrane, Meux, Gillibert, Bars, Campanari, Soulacroix, Milde, Feinholz, and Nebe. Basses: MM. Edouard de Reszke, Plançon, Journet, Lempriere Pringle, Carbone, Isnardon, Vaschetti, and Wittekopf.

Mme. Calvé, now thoroughly restored to health, hopes to be here during the first week, and will give her so-called "vaudeville" reading of Marguerite in "Faust," besides also appearing as Ophelia in Thomas's "Hamlet," as Margaret and Helen of Troy in "Mefistofele," as well, perhaps, as in "Carmen," "La Navarraise," and "Cavalleria Rusticana." Mme. Melba will be heard as Juliette, and also in a projected revival of some of the lighter Italian operas, parts which, twenty years ago, were in the repertory of the florid sopranos, a race which latterly has threatened to become almost extinct. For Frau Ternina, the eminent prima donna of Munich, who has already appeared at Mr. Schultz-Curtius' concerts, "Fidelio" will be revived, and the lady will also appear in the "Ring" cycles. For Mme. Brema also we are promised a revival of Gluck's "Orfeo," an opera which with Mlle. Giulia Ravogli as the hero was, a few years ago, played at first with success, but latterly rather too frequently. Massenet's "Sapho," which had provisionally been accepted, will now not be done, as it is said the proprietors of the copyright put a higher value upon the work than the Royal Opera Syndicate are willing to adopt. It will, however, not be missed, as the repertory, which consists of twenty-nine operas, is already a very full one.

The only novelty will accordingly be Dr. Saint-Saëns' "Henry VIII.," a work which promises to delight musicians and rather to astonish students of the history of Bluff King Hal. The opera is produced mainly for the sake of M. Renaud, who made so successful a début last year. Queen Katherine will, I believe, fall to Mme. Eames; but for the far superior part of Anne Boleyn Mme. Héglon, the distinguished mezzo-soprano of the Paris Grand Opéra, has been expressly engaged. Mancinelli's "Ero e Leandro" is also once more promised, besides a good many of the stock works of Mozart, Verdi, Rossini, Donizetti, Meyerbeer, and others. "Die Meistersinger" will again be given in Italian, although this essentially German work would certainly be better in its original tongue. In all fifteen operas will be performed in Italian, ten in French and four (besides the "Ring") namely, "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "Tristan," and "Fidelio," in German. M. Flon will conduct the French works, Signor Mancinelli the Italian operas, and Mottl the "Ring," while the rest of the German operas will be directed by Herr Zumpe, a gentleman who began musical life by playing that modest instrument the triangle at the Leipsic opera house in the early seventies, and who with Mottl, Seidl, and one or two others, was occupied for two years in correcting and writing out the band parts for the original production of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" at Bayreuth.

It has been stated in some quarters that the difficulty in the projected engagement of Dr. Richter for the "Ring" cycle at Covent Garden was a question of terms, and it has been asserted that the distinguished Viennese conductor demanded three times the fee of Seidl. Herr Seidl was paid £60 a week in the United States and, I believe, the same fee in London. Richter certainly never asked £180 a week, or anything like it. He—or, rather, his London manager, Mr. Vert, for him—asked a lump sum (never mind what) for the entire season; but the difficulty was not so much one of money as of certain stipulations which the great conductor desired to insist upon, but which were not found convenient in the hurry of a London season. Fortunately, Mottl, the next best man, was available, and a splendid series of performances may be expected.

I have received a batch of correspondence concerning the College of Violinists, about whose proposal to issue degrees or diplomas to teachers I had something to say a few weeks ago. The particular point in question now seems to be the advertising of the name of Herr (or Professor) Wilhelmj as one of the teachers. A gentleman, it seems, wrote to Herr Wilhelmj asking his terms for lessons to a professional pupil. Herr Wilhelmj replied, under date March 16, that his terms for professionals were two guineas for a single lesson, or twelve guineas for twelve consecutive lessons within twelve weeks. The gentleman thereupon wrote, pointing out that the terms were rather high, and saying, "Would you have time to take me at one of your classes at the College of Violinists, where I understand you are a Professor?" Herr Wilhelmj was then at his father's vineyard at Hattenheim, but he replied on a postcard as follows:—

Professor Wilhelmj does not teach at the Violinists' College, and gives only full hours' lessons at his residence.

Nevertheless, in reply to an application from this same gentleman, Mr. G. Foucher, hon. sec., wrote:—"Professor Wilhelmj gives lessons in the special section of not less than thirty minutes' duration; the terms for these are eight guineas for twelve lessons. Professor Wilhelmj does not give class tuition." This was on March 28. On April 7, in a letter to another would-be pupil, Mr. G. Foucher wrote:—"At present it is vacation time at the College, and I cannot say what days Professor Wilhelmj will be here next term. If you will suggest one or two suitable days and hours for your attendance, I will try, if possible, to arrange with Professor Wilhelmj to suit your other arrangements." There certainly seems to be some mistake here, for the letters of Mr. Foucher and Herr Wilhelmj are diametrically opposed. Perhaps Herr Wilhelmj may care to clear the matter up.

On Thursday the Philharmonic Concerts will be resumed after the holidays, and the distinguished pianist, Mme. Boomfield-Zeisler, will then make her London début. This clever lady was to have appeared at the Crystal Palace in 1893, but owing to illness she was unable to come to England. She now returns fresh from a series of triumphs in the United States. Mme. Zeisler, like so many other great pianists, was originally a juvenile prodigy. She is thirty-two and a native of Austrian Silesia. She, however, studied in Chicago, and for five years under Leschetizky, at Vienna. She has been before the public as an adult since 1884. Mme. Zeisler proposes, besides playing at the Philharmonic, to give two or more pianoforte recitals before she leaves.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim gave the first of his recitals on Saturday. This gentleman has erroneously been described as a débutant, but he really appeared here nine years ago. He is a brilliant performer of the school of Liszt, and again thoroughly substantiated his celebrity in a well diversified programme M. Lamoureux introduced at his final afternoon concert a new pianoforte concerto in F by M. Dubois, who succeeded Ambroise Thomas as conductor of the Paris Conservatoire. The concerto, which was produced in Paris as recently as last January, is rather poor stuff, although the two middle movements—for the work is in four movements—are simple and pretty. It is curious that French composers never seem to shine in the classical style. At the Crystal Palace there was for St. George's Day a programme partly devoted to English music. Miss Oakley, a fifteen-year-old soprano, who appeared at Queen's Hall on Saturday, should be recommended to continue her studies. She is promising, but her voice is necessarily not yet matured. On Tuesday, Herr Mottl made his re-appearance at Queen's Hall. Altogether thirty concerts are announced for this week, so that the season may be considered to have commenced in good earnest.

Signor Joseph Li Calsi died last week in London, at the age of seventy-two. Latterly he has been known chiefly as a teacher, but twenty years ago he was a popular and most painstaking opera conductor. Mme. Emilie Ambre, who during one season achieved some success as a prima donna at Her Majesty's Opera, likewise died last week. She was originally attached to the Court of Holland, but latterly she, with her husband, a well-known organist, has devoted herself to the direction of a successful school of music in Paris.

I have once or twice referred to Miss Pauline Joran, one of Mr. D'Oyly Carte's accessions to the Savoy company, as "formerly of the Carl Rosa troupe." The lady, however, desires to be known as "late of the Royal Opera," which, I fear, is rather a left-handed compliment to the Rosa Company, by whom she was first brought out. As a matter of fact, Miss Joran came to Covent Garden in 1893, then appearing for the first time in London as Beppe in "L'Amico Fritz," on the night that the composer, Signor Mascagni, made his début in England as a conductor. Miss Joran had until then been a member of the Carl Rosa troupe, and had played the same part of Beppe with them in the provinces. Nevertheless, if she prefers to drop the Carl Rosa and to fly her flag from Covent Garden, I am sure I am willing enough to oblige the lady in so small a matter.

Every one will regret to learn of the death of Miss Nanette Kuhe, the amiable and accomplished daughter of the well-known pianist, conductor, and teacher, Mr. Wilhelm Kuhe. Miss Nanette was herself an excellent pianist, and both in Brighton and London she had a large circle of admirers and pupils. She was also a hard-working teacher, a good musician, and in every sense of the word a most popular lady.

All sorts of reports have come over here as to the succession to Seidl as conductor in the United States. As a matter of fact Seidl held many posts which are likely now to be divided. A permanent orchestra was about to be organised especially for him, and it is possible the scheme may now be abandoned. There are also in New York the Philharmonic and various other appointments, the most important being the post of conductor of the Wagnerian works at the Metropolitan House. It would not surprise many people here if some arrangement were made with Mr. Damrosch, who is director of a rival scheme and, moreover, is son-in-law of the wealthy Mr. Carnegie. If the Damrosch and Grau operatic enterprises could be amalgamated, it might be all the better for both.

Mr. Robert Newman will on Saturday afternoon next take his well-deserved benefit at Queen's Hall. Mr. Newman has been referred to in certain quarters as the inventor of the Sunday concerts, although, as a matter of fact, Sunday musical performances were given under the auspices of the Sunday League, and also at the Albert Hall, while Mr. Newman was still a student. But it is nevertheless a fact that the Sunday concert movement received an enormous impetus thanks to Mr. Newman's enterprise. At his own cost and risk he organised a first-rate series of Sunday afternoon orchestral concerts at Queen's Hall, bearding the bigots who threatened him with actions for penalties—though they eventually proved too chicken-livered to issue a writ—and giving bored Londoners during the winter a Sunday afternoon entertainment of a refining and elevating sort. Success has now crowned his efforts, and the benefit concert next Saturday may be ascribed partly as a compliment to him for his services on behalf of a rational Sunday, partly as a recognition of his work in support of British, Russian, and French music, and in the foundation of a permanent orchestra at Queen's Hall. Madame Ella Russell has volunteered to sing on Saturday, and the programme is an enormously strong one, comprising some of the most popular excerpts from Wagner's operas.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—"Of all aprons," says Teufelsdröckh, "the most puzzling to me hitherto has been the Episcopal. Wherein consists the usefulness of this apron? The Overseer (Episcopus) of Souls, I notice, has tucked in the corner of it, as if his day's work were done. What does he shadow forth thereby?" That his day's work is done. In reading Dr. Carr's "Life Work of Archbishop Benson" (1) you cannot help feeling the conviction that such dignitaries are as much mediæval survivals as their cathedrals. Only a man who belonged essentially to the Middle Ages could have used the fine opportunity Archbishop Benson had a few days before his death in addressing an audience of 3,000 people in Belfast, to urge upon them only the imperative need of—a cathedral! Even an English Archbishop might have recognised the fact that cathedrals are out of date in a day when the appeal is made to the ear and not to the eye, and when the sacrifice is offered for, and not by, the worshippers. No less characteristic of an Anglican Archbishop was his Grace's compromise on the subject of the Sunday opening of museums. He approved of it—gave it his "moral" support—but opposed the measure in the Lords on the ground that it would lead to increased work on Sundays—ground that would shut up every church, chapel, and cathedral in England. Surely purgatory must have been invented for the accommodation of the Anglican Church, which would naturally object to Heaven and to Hell as extremes and prefer the compromise of an intermediate state. Whether we shall be better off in the day which Mr. Robert Buchanan foreshadows in his "Rev. Annabel Lee" (2) is another question. Our Anglican clergy, like all other Anglican things, are compromises—compromises between the two sexes—but I should prefer an epicene priesthood to such hysterical lady-preachers as the Rev. Annabel Lee. Mr. Buchanan should have laid to heart the discreet counsel of the judge, "Give your verdict, sentence or opinion, but never give your reasons for it." It was fatal to give a glowing description of the marvellous "scholarship, eloquence, and magnetic charm" of the lady preacher, and follow it up with a twaddling specimen sermon from her lips. Heredity, which is the pivot of the plot of "The Rev. Annabel Lee," is the pivot also of the plot of the first story in Bret Harte's new volume, "Tales of Trail and Town" (3). Its moral, however, is the usual Yankee one, which Artemus Ward thus humorously expressed :—

> I hear the poor Injin is being driven nearer and nearer to the setting sun. It's raythor rough on the setting sun; but I am rejiced to hear it. Injins is pison, wherever found."

"The Ancestors of Peter Atherly" is a very striking story, but it isn't the most striking in this admirable collection. Better still is "The Strange Appearance of Alkali Dick," and still better "The Judgment of Bolinas Plain." I turn to salute a rising star in Mr. Frank Mathew, whose "Spanish Wine" (4) assures me and will assure you of a great future. It is a perfect gem, a Greek tragedy set in Celtic scenes and lit by

> The light that never was on sea or land;
> The consecration, and the poet's dream.

When you open upon a passage like this you know what you are to expect, and you are not disappointed :—

> Still her dreams sought for a magnificent lover coming over the sea. Some fine morning a galleon would sail out of the sunrise with a glory of banners and ramparted and firing salutes. The sea was now her companion and its moods had an echo in her heart, and she was sore when the waves were charging with monotonous cheers, and was quieted if she heard them below, murmuring like a varying rain, or like the regular sweeping of a brush, when they sidled up to the beach with whispers, as if making amends for old irrational anger.

All the separate scenes in the story are exquisitely painted, but they are rather mosaics than coherent parts of an integral whole. The vivid incidents flash upon you like lightning from wide apart and unlooked-for quarters of the heavens. There is no lack of coherence in Mr. Stanley Weyman's "Shrewsbury" (5), but in other ways, and relatively to the author's other work, it is a poor story. Mere roguery is not sympathetic, and much besides roguery goes to the making of a "Barry Lyndon," and the autobiographer of "Shrewsbury" is far indeed from being a Barry Lyndon. There are, however, many stirring scenes in the story, which, besides, is admirably written.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—London is getting very interesting, now that the season is so close at hand, for we can hardly count it as really the season just yet, when so many people have not yet returned after the Easter holidays. There was a most diversified and fascinating crowd at the private view at the New Gallery. I had thought private views played out until Saturday, but the occasion proved that they have experienced quite a rejuvenescence—at least, it seemed so, for it is hardly logical to say that one swallow makes a summer. Literature and the drama were well represented, and we enjoyed the opportunity of studying many persons in the flesh who had before been known to us only through their hooks or behind the footlights. The wife of an actor was the most gorgeously attired individual there. She had carried out to the uttermost the decorative possibilities contained in the new way of wearing the cape—half on and half off the shoulders. It opens up a vista for the display of jewellery and bright colour that must deeply gratify the ornate-minded. The rich simplicity of Lady Hood's black satin lightly relieved with white was restful after a study of effects in coral-pink, brick-red, and the peculiarly livid and trying "new colour," periwinkle blue. I begin to detest it. A wonderfully courageous old lady walked about in a copious grass-green mantle trimmed with Turkish table-centres. In her bonnet she had two babyish bunches of cowslips. A pretty actress in black had turquoise velvet revers on her well-fitting coat, sewn with jet and turquoise. Two Chinese gentlemen looked rather lonely and left early. It must be rather sad to be in England without understanding English. Languages are not our strong point as a nation. I believe there are only two members of the Cabinet who speak French quite fluently. And French is the diplomatic language of Europe.

A brave young lady appeared in fancy dress, period Henry VIII. She wore black, with white slashings on the sleeves, and her hat was of the shape associated with Edward VI., the flat crown being a network of black lines, crossed with white. Two sisters proved, by dressing exactly alike, how fatal is such a practice to the less effective of the twain. Lady Coleridge looked very young and pretty in black, with a rose-pink straw hat and a chemisette of paler pink. Lady Carew, in brown, was for once without her sister, Mrs. Clifford Cory. Sir Squire Bancroft talked of Monte Carlo and its joys. Miss Violet Hunt may have been seeking inspiration for another novel in the pictures. Perhaps she found it in No. 209!

An apricot satin blouse was in itself a beautiful bit of colour, but was also absolutely destructive to the complexion of the wearer. A little lady in black had put on far too much rouge for probability. She was impossibly pink. Complexions, like churches, are often spoiled by being restored. The ruins are more picturesque than the repaired article.

I know a charming face on which the teint fatigué is almost as pleasing as youthful bloom, and certainly very much prettier than any arrangement of paint and powder.

We have heard so much about green shoes being worn this summer that we hied us to the American Shoe Company in Regent-street to ask if it is true. They are not doing much in that way, they told us, though they, too, had heard that green kid was considerably to the fore. One of their novelties is a pretty grey suède shoe, Langtry shape, with a large steel buckle. The steel looks particularly well with the soft tone of grey in the kid. The white glacé kid Langtry shoes are sometimes made with a mother-o'-pearl buckle, and this too has a very good effect. The brown glacé kids are in five different tones of colour. One of these is in the exact tint of a cigar, and goes well with beige and sand-coloured gowns, as well as those in white and cream colour. The kid is, in every case, very soft and flexible. Their Russia leather Burlington shoe is very dainty, as well as the red in the same shape. For boating a white canvas shoe is to be the thing. "Blanco," I believe, is the best stuff to clean them with. And for cycling there is a combination of shoe and gaiter which is as workmanlike as it is ornamental. The gaiter portion looks like a brown silk openwork stocking, and is lined with stout stone-coloured canvas. The shoe is in brown kid.

I am wondering what sort of hat you bought yourself in your country town after all the excellent advice I lavished on you. I wished so much that you had been with us in Clifford-street at Madame Yorke's the other day, when we were looking at her new hats and toques fresh from Paris. The turban is one of the novelties of the season. It is not in the least alarming, as you might perhaps fancy, from the name. Soft folds of point-d'esprit net, with tiny black dots strewn over it, are twisted round a circular frame of wired net, and in front just above the brow, a few folds are carried up in a slightly diagonal direction. Two round jet pins of unusually large size fasten, or appear to fasten, a wide black velvet bow on the top of the turban. The very newest hats are sharply turned up in front, and suit some faces admirably well. One of these, in black straw, was trimmed with shaded cherries, that looked as if the stem had been twisted in and out of the straw of which the hat was composed. Two high jetted plumes completed the composition. When we were shown a little boat-shaped hat in black straw lined with white, it never occurred to us that it was intended to be worn in any way but the usual, with the peak to the front. The correct way, however, is with the two points at the sides. So worn it was highly becoming, with its large white tulle rosettes and two black ibis feathers sequined over in jet. These large rosettes of tulle are very fashionable just now in millinery. A bonnet—I told you they were coming in again—had one of these in white thrust through with a pair of pearl pins, the rest of the structure consisting of very light-looking wings of wired black net. At the back one of the new large tortoiseshell combs was so arranged as to form part of the bonnet and to fasten it to the hair. This is quite a new idea.

All pink and all red hats seem to be in great favour. We saw a large pink straw one with the brim bending down over the eyes. It would be admirable for bridesmaids. It was entirely outlined with roses in the exact tone of pink as that of the straw. The rest of the trimming consisted of a long pink chiffon scarf, tied in a delicious bow on the top of the crown and edged with pretty cream-tinted lace. At the back the brim was turned up with a cache-peigne of green rose-foliage. In the same way a mauve straw toque had a market bunch of cowslips at the back and two feathers in front for finish. A cardinal straw toque was made with the crown like a large straw bow. It had wide ibis feathers, also red, and a twist of red chiffon. Another very up-to-date straw toque was in two shades of cornflower, one dark blue, the other periwinkle. They combined very well. Cherries were the trimming.

To suit the new hats and toques the hair must be dressed very high, and it is still wide dispread at the sides. I see that many of the smart people have it waved over the ears, so that it is not surprising that the new toques are extremely wide.

A most attractive concert is announced to take place at Stafford House, by permission of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, on the afternoon of May 11. It is to be in aid of the funds of the Charing Cross Hospital, and is to be a smart affair. Mrs. Arthur Paget is the hon. sec. On the committee are several Duchesses, and a score or so of Countesses, and the programme for the entertainment promises to be an interesting one, well worth the guinea to be charged for tickets. Among the artists who have generously promised their services are Miss Marie Tempest, Miss Clara Butt, Miss Cissie Loftus, Miss Letty Lind, Miss Louie Freear, Mr. Norman Salmond, Mrs. Brown Potter, and M. Johannes Wolff. Gunter is to supply light refreshments for the benefit of the Fund, visitors being charged 1s. each for these—a plan that must work out well for the charity.

We went to the Vegetarian Banquet at the Holborn Restaurant that I told you about some time ago. If you remember, I wondered what dishes they could collect together of sufficient importance, without fish, flesh, or fowl, to be dignified by the title of banquet. Well, dear, we had an excellent meal, the only fault to be found with it, from the outsider's point of view, being the beverages, for vegetarians are, it appears, total abstainers to a man. No mention of beverages was made on the menu, but there were "loving-cups" of lemonade, "Julien" composed of sugar and fruit, and lime-juice cordials, in addition to plain water—the best of all, if we could only get it pure. Each guest found a buttonhole of dainty flowers tied to the menu card at the side of every cover, and there were plenty of flowers on the tables.

It seemed odd to begin dinner with cream-cheese, but it was regarded as a hors-d'œuvre. The one soup was excellent, being composed chiefly of tomatoes, and very pleasantly flavoured. The first entrée was potatoes with peas, not apples, as you might imagine from the incorrect wording of the menu. The haricots were mixed with fresh French beans.

The cutlets, really composed of mashed potatoes, looked extremely like the real things, with a little twist of fringed paper indicating where the bone of the meat, conspicuous by its absence, should have been. Fried of a delicate brown, and served with green peas and white sauce, they were most appetising.

Perhaps the nicest of the different entrées were the stuffed baked tomatoes, which quite deluded one into the idea that minced meats of some kind, seasoned and flavoured with vegetables and condiments, must be one of the chief constituents of the stuffing. As pretty as they were appetising were the hearts of artichokes, piled up in pyramidal fashion, with carefully cooked spinach. Another delicate entrée was composed of endive cooked with cream. It was served with what appeared to be quarters of potatoes, fried a pale golden brown colour, but these were really pieces of fried pastry. The menu was further varied with asparagus, served with oil, and haricot beans of the palest golden colour, cooked in butter, each one separate and unbroken. Scattered among them were shred French beans.

Sweets were well represented by jelly, in which there were various kinds of fruits; custard pudding, and caramel; pretty white balls, each one composed of boiled rice and half an apple, surrounded with apple syrup, partly jellied, and of a pretty pink colour; finishing up with ice pudding.

The chairman, Dr. Josiah Oldfield, is not only a lover of vegetarians, but a lively hater of what he virulently called "the carnivorous and omnivorous class." He spoke most censoriously and bitterly. Perhaps he would, like Mahomet, make converts by fire and the sword. We had always heard that one of the great advantages of vegetarianism was that it encouraged gentleness and peaceful sentiments, but the Society's chosen spokesman disproved this for us. He would have done better to have ignored, for the moment, Sir Henry Thompson's article in the Nineteenth Century, recommending meat eating, for his mention of it was the first intimation that many present had had of the publication of such an article, and the thought of it seemed to rouse the speaker to fury. His sarcasms gave a good opportunity to Mr. Candy, Q.C., to respond in terms of cultured raillery in an amiable and friendly way. He handsomely admitted that if he were sure of having as good a dinner every day as on that occasion, he would not mind becoming a teetotaller for a year. Everything was well cooked and daintily served, and, as Richard remarked, with a glass of good English beer, or, as a vis-à-vis of ours said, "If the Julien had been the real thing," the banquet would have been most satisfactory. We noticed that the voices of the vegetarian speakers were much thinner and weaker than those of the meat-eating gentlemen, and we wondered if vegetarianism alone would have this effect, or if it were not assisted by what they call their "Temperance" principles.

All of the speakers were keenly alive to the advantage of girls belonging to the School Board having lessons in cooking and preparing vegetables, cereals, and every kind of vegetarian food. Canon Ingram spoke strongly on the subject, and is anxious that boys should be also taught the art of such cookery, particularly useful to the many who go to sea and into the army.

Seeing an advertisement of a penny cookery book of the Society in a daily paper, we sent the necessary stamp and duly received the little book. But vain were our hopes of finding in it instructions to produce the excellent dishes we had tasted at the banquet. The Society's worst enemy could not have done it a worse turn than by distributing this pamphlet, with its absurd recipes, which must have been compiled by some one destitute of the smallest knowledge of cookery. Instead of attracting disciples to the cause, these dreadful recipes would repel them. Take the first, Caledonian Soup, or what we call Scotch Broth, only without meat. We are desired to cook 4 tablespoonfuls of Scotch barley in a pint of water, with 3 good-sized onions, 2 small turnips, a carrot, and a head of celery. Where would the one pint of water be under this mass of vegetable and barley? The result would not be soup, but pudding. Directions are given for baking haricot beans without soaking them, the time for the baking being given as two hours. Haricots, as we all know, will not cook without having been soaked twelve hours at least, and even then two hours are the minimum time for cooking them. The recipe has a note appended: "Haricots cook more easily if soaked in water for a few hours." In the same way instructions are given to stew lentils without previously having soaked them.

The recipe for "savoury pie" is most remarkable. The list of ingredients begins with "cold omelet," and runs on with tapioca and eggs. The tapioca and omelet are laid in a pie dish in layers and covered with paste. Then come the following directions: "Add the eggs when the pie is nearly done. Supply water as needed to keep the tapioca at the bottom from burning." Is the cook to take off the top of the pie to add water and eggs? If she does not, the pie will very certainly burn, for a quarter of a pint of water is the only liquid in which the cold omelet, three eggs, and two tablespoonfuls of tapioca are to cook.

In a recipe for "bread-crumb omelet" a teacupful of dried marjoram and a large handful of parsley are the quantities given for flavouring one pint of breadcrumbs. In the recipes dealing with macaroni, the cook is always desired to soak it for an hour or an hour and a half. The effect of this would be to reduce it to a paste when cooked.

Can you imagine any one sending out such a book as this without at least having the recipes tested? Even in those that seem to be fairly practicable the wording of them is so vague that it is difficult to understand what is meant. But most of them are thoroughly impracticable. In "Cherry Ratafia" there are 20 lb. of fruit and 2½ of sugar. This is to be bottled after thirty days. There would be about a pint, if so much, to bottle, and even that would not keep with so little sugar in it! Any misguided housewife who should lay out her money on 20 lb. of fruit would feel very angry with that recipe. The sooner the Vegetarian Society withdraw their penny book, the better for the promulgation of their gospel.

Do you see that all the cows in Belgium are to wear earrings? Does it not sound strange? But it is not intended as a decoration. It is a hygienic measure, intended to prevent the introduction into Belgium of animals suffering from tuberculosis. But will it not be easy for persons who wish their cows to visit Belgium to provide the animals with earrings for the trip?

I want some member of Parliament to inquire into the working of the penny-in-the-slot way of supplying gas to persons in humble neighbourhoods. I am told that when the agent of the gas Companies goes round to collect the pence out of the slots, he almost invariably makes a further charge against his customers. Now surely he has no right to do this, for if the Company contracts to purvey gas in pennyworths measured out by themselves, they cannot have any excuse for exacting other pence. That this has been done I know for a fact, and as the poor are so long-suffering and so patient under all sorts of injustice, I want to find some one who will look into the matter for them. Their pennies are precious to them, but even if they were not, there is here a wrong to be set right.

Christabel writes from Paris:—

Three pretty dresses are worn by Mdlle. Béry in "Mon Enfant," at the Odéon. The first was beige cloth with a wide band of guipure round the skirt about half way up; the bodice was entirely of guipure, with gold galon in front and a waistband of the same, but wider; then there was a little cloth bolero without sleeves to be taken on or off at will, and, of course, showing the guipure sleeves.

The second gown was grey crêpe de chine; the skirt, made with small pleats, was very flat, and the bodice had similar small pleats and a yellow satin yoke, the front opening over full silk muslin of the same shade as the crêpe de chine.

The third was cloth in the shade of Parma violets; the skirt richly embroidered with applications of cloth and guipure; the bolero bodice and sleeves were embroidered to match, and underneath was a silk muslin chemisette. These pretty toilettes were made at Laferrière's, and would serve as useful ideas for spring dresses.

Beige, sand colour, dove, and all those soft shades are much in vogue, especially in a light make of summer cloth, whether for costumes, capes, or jackets, and also the last new thing in redingotes. These are shaped at the back, though in front rather easy, and ornamented with one or two flounces of the cloth, which fall in cascades from the neck down the front and go round the redingote. It is ground-length at the back but rounds off towards the front in order to show a glimpse of the under skirt. The flounces are neither hemmed, bound, or scalloped, just the cloth edge cut very straight. The sleeves have cuffs falling over the hands and opening out very wide. One I saw was plain on the shoulders, another had a short coachman's cape. It is a novelty, but I do not see the utility of the garment, as the effect is rather of the dressing-gown style.

A beautiful evening dress made for Comtesse de la Bouillerie, lady-in-waiting on the Duchesse d'Orléans, has the white satin skirt made very long behind with several flounces of Brussels lace at the back, which, coming to the front, formed a drapery mixed with wild roses and foliage. The low bodice was draped with similar lace, with a corselet of white satin covered with pearls, gold beads, and spangles. To wear with this dress was a very pretty neck-ruff of green satin, sown with rose leaves covered with diamonds.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—The idea of war turns our thoughts from our own everyday ordinary lives. Although it may not touch us, at least we shall be spectators, as it were, of the dreadful tragedy. And the pity of it! To think of the horrible deaths, the sufferings, the pain and heartbreaking to which so many human beings like ourselves are now doomed. As if there is not enough sorrow in the world without adding to it with deliberate intent. What a contradiction to the theory of the survival of the fittest war is—the method of the primeval savage. One would think that civilisation, to say nothing of Christianity, ought to have swept it away. We have progressed to the extent that individuals do not settle their quarrels through means of the sword; why, then, the sum of these individuals, that is, nations, should still continue to do so is hard to understand.

If only imagination were a more universal gift surely war would be impossible. A vivid realisation of its full and awful meaning could not but prevent all who had even the most elementary feelings of humanity from adopting any such barbarous method. Every judge feels acutely in sentencing a man to death, and declaration of war is the sentence of death to hundreds of thousands of men. Yet how little this seems to be realised. Perhaps because the idea of deaths by thousands becomes somewhat of an abstract one to us, we, who might faint and sicken to see even one man die, read almost with indifference of the deaths of thousands. Not from hardness of heart or inhumanity, but just because we fail to realise that the thousands are made up of units. As for the Jingoes who shout for war but never go into it themselves, who, from the security of a comfortable home or office, urge others to destruction, are they not too contemptible for words? Was there ever a woman more to be pitied just now than the Queen of Spain, though she has risen so heroically to the occasion? No matter what one's sympathies otherwise may be, as a woman one must sympathise with her.

Meanwhile our world not being called on to be either heroic or serious at present goes on its ordinary course, whilst contemplating from a distance the more solemn aspects of life. For thus runs the world away. Lord Cadogan unexpectedly remained in England all last week, leaving Lady Cadogan to fulfil his social engagements. She alone dined with the Lord Chancellor and Lady Ashbourne, who, after dinner, held a big reception in their house in Merrion-square. In addition to the usual elect of society, many of the chief luminaries and others of the Irish Protestant Church, assembled in Dublin for the annual synod meeting were present. Lady Cadogan, as usual, was handsomely dressed and resplendent in diamonds, the display of which by those of our sex in high place is generally numbered amongst the duties that they owe to society. Her Excellency did all that she could by energetic agreeability to make up for the absence of his Excellency. What a dull form of entertainment an evening reception is without music, or anything to make a break or stir in it. One does indeed take one's pleasure at it very sadly, and this rule being universal, the wonder is that this special form of entertainment survives. A curious thing, too, though every one grumbles, every one goes. "Receptions" are amongst the most crowded of evening parties. One knows that there are many who like to grumble, and one can only suppose that there are many, as well, who like to be bored.

During the week we were much occupied with Punchestown toilets—that is, in having them prepared—and in making up parties for the races. The weather has been very April like, nothing but samples, day after day. We have had some most exquisite days of sunshine that summer could not surpass; it made the cold wind pleasantly refreshing rather than chill. Then, as a change, downpours and leaden skies have had their turn. One can hope anything for Punchestown and fear everything as well. On Friday Col. Crichton had a perfect day for his gymkhana at Mullaboden. Lady Cadogan, with a Viceregal suit, went by special train from Dublin, Lord Cadogan who had been expected, was detained in London by the superior attractions of a Cabinet Council. Kildare mustered in great strength, many of the Punchestown visitors having already arrived. Amongst the assemblage were Lord and Lady Mayo, Lord Enniskillen, Lord and Lady Settrington, Lady Albreda Bourke, pretty Miss Crichton, and many other pretty and prettily-dressed matrons and maidens. The weather allowed winter garb to be cast aside and spring dresses to appear in light variety. The "variety entertainment" of the day was enthusiastically enjoyed. Lady Cadogan, at the end, presented the prizes to the winners.

What a pity that long dresses should now have established their dominion! They do not suit our changing weather, or modern active habits. What can be more trying to the temper and wearying to the spirit than the effort to hold up a long, wide skirt in wet and muddy places? And, on the other hand, the awful alternative of not holding it up! What a case of the d——l and the deep sea. And to think that we deliberately place ourselves in the unpleasant position!—Yours ever,

Clare.

I shall have some nice recipes for you next week.—Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

NEW NOVEL BY LEWIS SERGEANT.

Now ready, in 1 vol. crown 8vo, 6s.

THE CAPRICE OF JULIA.

By Lewis Sergeant.

"Its plot is good, the character of Julia herself is well realised and adequately portrayed, and many of the scenes interest and convince. Other characters besides Julia's are well imagined and carefully wrought, and the situations are well conceived and brought forth with no lack of strength in the creator or of success in the result. 'The Caprice of Julia' is a book to be read."—Pall Mall Gazette.

TWO NEW NOVELS, AT 6s. EACH.

TALES OF UNREST. By JOSEPH CONRAD.

The Daily Telegraph.—"Mr. Conrad brings vividly before us the wild, picturesque life of the curiously untamable race that inhabits the [Malay] Archipelago. His figures are real flesh and blood, drawn to the life."

PELICANHOUSE, E.C. A NOVEL OF FINANCE.

By B. B. WEST.

FIRST REVIEW.—"One of the most entertaining financial stories we ever read. . . . Delightfully humorous . . . The whole subject is treated with so light a touch, and the extravagant nature of the requests so cunningly invested with an air of reality, that our intellectual enjoyment in the perusal of his book is never allowed to flag for an instant, nor do the delicate flavour of his humour and kindly cynicism tend to cloy."—Glasgow Mail.

MR. JOHN LONG'S POPULAR NOVELS.

A FOURTH EDITION HAS BEEN DEMANDED.

TREWINNOT OF GUY'S.

Mrs. COULSON KERNAHAN'S New Novel of Medical Life. Cloth gilt, 6s.

"The story teems with incident. Every personage in it is a character, and it would be impossible to deny their cleverness or the perceptive powers which they reveal. The hero, Trewinnot himself, is admirably drawn. The enthusiastic young student, at once light-hearted and earnest, with his capacity for wholesouled devotion and his enjoyment of 'a lark,' could hardly be better done. This breezy and attractive personality dominates the whole style of the book." The World.

A LARGE FIRST EDITION HAS BEEN REQUIRED.

A DIFFICULT MATTER.

A New and Original Novel by Mrs. LOVETT CAMERON. Cloth gilt, 6s.

A SECOND EDITION HAS BEEN CALLED FOR.

ALL THEY WENT THROUGH.

F. W. ROBINSON'S New Book. By the Author of "Young Nin," &c. Cloth gilt, 6s. Second Edition.

"Mr. F. W. Robinson is an old friend, and wherever we turn in this volume we find reasons for applause, and we can assure our readers that they will not go astray if they spend money and time and attention upon 'All They Went Through.'"

A SECOND EDITION HAS BEEN REACHED.

THE STORY OF LOIS.

KATHARINE S. MACQUOID'S New Novel. By the Author of "Patty," &c. Cloth gilt, 6s.

"Contains some of Katharine Macquoid's best work. A delightful story marked by graceful writing."—Glasgow Herald.

THE LARGE FIRST EDITION IS NEARLY ABSORBED.

YOUTH AT THE PROW.

E. RENTOUL ESLER'S New Book. By the Author of "The Way They Loved at Grimpat," &c. Cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"There is no living writer of fiction, not one, whose powers within their range are more striking and definite than those of Mrs. Rentoul Esler."—Newcastle Chronicle.

NEW NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER.

WITH BOUGHT SWORDS.

By HARRY FOWLER. Cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"An exceedingly interesting story. It deals with the trials of an English girl who threatens to fall into the toils of a profligate American president. The theme of the story is composed of a blending of love and war, and there is not a wearisome page in the book."—Dundee Courier (First Review).

THE SEA OF LOVE.

New Book by WALTER PHELPS DODGE, Author of "A Strong Man Armed." Cloth gilt, 1s. 6d. [April 29th.

"THE BOOK OF THE HOUR."

HIS LITTLE BILL OF SALE.

By ELLIS J. DAVIS, Barrister-at-Law. Cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"Mr. Davis knows his subject thoroughly, and his exposure of the evils of the whole money-lending system and of the law which protects the usurer is admirable. He gives also sound advice to those who may be tightly placed in respect to money. As a novel with a purpose it is at once useful and interesting. It will do good to both rich and poor to read it."—Scotsman.

London: JOHN LONG, 6, Chandos-street, Strand.

NEW BOOKS.

NOW READY.

Demy 8vo, cloth, price 12s. 6d.

ARISTOCRACY AND EVOLUTION.

A Study of the Rights, the Origin, and the Social Functions of the Wealthier Classes. By W. H. MALLOCK, Author of "Labour and the Popular Welfare," "Classes and Masses," &c.

"With the main idea of this work, which is quite the most important that Mr. Mallock has yet produced, we do not think there can be any dispute, though most of the active sociologists in England either ignore that idea or are openly hostile to it."—Spectator.

HIS GRACE O' THE GUNNE.

By I. HOOPER, Author of "A Singer of Marly." Crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

"Really a clever, entertaining volume. . . . No common piece of work."—The Athenæum.

"A sturdy, vigorous, and wholesome story, and one well worth reading."—Literary World.

"For the further developments of this thrilling tale, which culminate in a supremely heroic climax, we must claim our readers' permission to refer them to Part II. of 'His Grace o' the Gunne,' which is even more rife with sensational incident than the first half of that powerful and fascinating work."—Daily Telegraph.

THE STORY OF GLADSTONE'S

LIFE. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P. Containing 45 Illustrations, mostly Page Portraits representing Mr. Gladstone at different periods. In 1 vol., extra crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, price 7s. 6d.

"This is a charmingly written sketch of Mr. Gladstone's public career, with some interesting glimpses at the same time into his private life."—The Observer.

THE VITALITY OF CHRISTIAN

DOGMAS. By A. SABATIER, D.D., Dean of the Faculty of Protestant Theology, Paris. Translated by Mrs. Em. Christen. With Preface by the Very Reverend the Hon. W. H. Fremantle, D.D., Dean of Ripon. Crown 8vo, 96 pages, cloth, price 1s. 6d. net.

"Is really a gem of theological constructive criticism. With marvellous lucidity and penetration, Dr. Sabatier states for us here the philosophy and natural history of the dogma, its position and use in the Christian evolution."—Christian World.

THE POEMS OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by GEORGE WYNDHAM, M.P. Demy 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 10s. 6d.

This edition contains the "Venus," "Lucrece," and Sonnets, and is prefaced with an elaborate Introduction of over 140 pp. The Text is founded on the First Quartos, with an endeavour to retain the original reading. A set of Notes deals with the problems of Date, Rival Poets, Typography, and Punctuation; and the Editor has commented on obscure passages in the light of contemporary works. The Publishers believe that no such complete edition has ever been published.

"One of the most serious contributions to Shakespearian criticism that has been published for some time, and its publication assures to Mr. George Wyndham an honourable place among men of letters. He comes well equipped with knowledge, and is well endowed with higher critical gifts."—Times.

WATER SUPPLY.

Send for Illustrated List, No. 49, of

JOHN BLAKE'S Patent Self-Acting HYDRAULIC RAMS

For Raising Water for the Supply of Towns, Villages, Irrigation, Railway Stations, Mansions, Fountains, Farms, &c.
No cost for Motive Power, which is obtained from a Stream of Water passing through the Ram. No Oiling or Packing required. Made in Sizes to raise from 300 to 400,000 gallons per day. Will force to a Height of 800 feet.

Fig. A.—This Ram lifts part of the same water that works it. (Engraved from photo. of Ram which raises 250,000 gallons per day of 24 hours to medium heights, with good working fall.)

This view represents a Ram worked by impure river water, whilst pumping pure water from a well or spring and forcing it to a small reservoir on the hill, at an elevation of 532 ft. and a distance of one mile, from which reservoir the water is gravitated for fire extinguishing and general requirements of mansion, stables, farm, and village.

Fig. B.—This Ram, whilst worked by a stream of impure water, will pump clean water from a well or spring.

TESTIMONIALS.

From A. FIDLER, Esq., Assoc.M.Inst.C.E., Engineer to the Corporation of Blackburn.

Municipal Offices, Blackburn, July 2nd, 1896.

DEAR SIR,—After having had the New Hydraulic Rams at Guide working without intermission for over six months, I am now able to give you the results of the test. A pair of your Rams which we fixed in 1886 to force 16,000 gallons of water per day for the supply of the district of Guide, above our highest reservoir, pumped up much more than that quantity, and worked well until six months ago, when the consumption of water in the district having largely increased, they were superseded by a pair of your latest Patent Rams to raise 50,000 gallons per day. From a test I have recently made, I find their maximum lifting power exceeds 84,000 GALLONS PER DAY, forced through 1,295 yards of delivery pipe, against a head of 190 feet (including pipe friction). From another test made I found that both Rams supplied with 327,816 gallons per day, with a working fall of 32 feet 3 inches, pumped 47,188 gallons per day to a height of 175 feet (including pipe friction), giving 78 PER CENT. OF EFFICIENCY. The new Rams have worked well and continuously, and, having NO METALLIC CLACKS OR VALVES, their action is smooth and without shock. They are extremely simple, and readily adjusted to vary their lifting power. It requires no skill to keep them in order, or put in new working parts, when that comes to be necessary. Considering that the waste driving water from the Rams flows into a lower service reservoir, a very cheap system of supplying the high-level district is thus utilised. The work done by you is of high-class, and very creditable to you.

From COLONEL A. EGERTON, Comptroller and Treasurer of the Household of H.R.H. The Duke of Connaught.

Buckingham Palace, May 14th, 1897.

COLONEL ALFRED EGERTON has much pleasure in acquainting Mr. John Blake that the Hydraulic Ram which he supplied to the Duke of Connaught, at Bagshot Park, two years ago, has continued to work most satisfactorily.

From Messrs. WINTERTON & SONS, Estate Agents, Walton Warren, Burton-on-Trent.

May 25th, 1897.

DEAR SIR,—We are pleased to report as highly satisfactory the working of the Patent "B" Ram which you fixed, to our order, in 1895, at Oaklands Farm, Walton-on-Trent, for Richard Ratcliffe, Esq., of Stanford Hall. The Ram is worked by a small stream of impure water, and forces spring water through 1,267 yards of delivery pipe to a storage tank, 102 feet above the Ram, from which tank you laid a gravitation main and branches, having a total length of 3,645 yards; also 14 cattle troughs, and supply pipe to farm yard, with various draw-off cocks, ball valves, and other fittings. We are pleased to say that you carried out the work to our entire satisfaction, and the Ram has gone well without any cost for repairs. The Ram works very well, and we are perfectly satisfied with the work.

Yours truly, WINTERTON & SONS.

Every Bottle bears the Signature of the Proprietor, ANDREAS SAXLEHNER.

THE TASMANIAN TIN DREDGING COMPANY, LIMITED.

The whole of the Working Capital of 10,000 Preference Shares has been subscribed and allotted, and dredging machinery and plant are now under construction.

Tin production for 1897 was 2,500 tons short of consumption, Straits supplies falling off from greater cost of working, the profit estimate of this Company is based at £3 per ton under current rates, the difference representing the rise in price since the formation of the Company.

Mr. C. K. Sheard, M.Inst.C.E., late Government Superintending Engineer Public Works Department, N.W. Coast, Tasmania, who has agreed to act as Managing Director of the Company in Tasmania, in a letter accompanying his report, writes: "I have not the slightest hesitation in strongly recommending this investment, and, if required, can obtain dozens of reports from experts supporting my views, for none other can be reported."

Mr. J. G. Stitt, Memb. Metallurgical Society, a well-known authority on mining matters in Tasmania, states in his report: "I have every confidence in recommending this property to capitalists and investors, if worked on the scale and by the method proposed by Mr. Sheard in his report, for I find he considerably under-estimated the probable results, the experiments giving very much larger returns than his calculations are based upon. This proposed method for working these immense deposits, in my opinion, is the best that can be adopted. The capital required should not exceed £10,000 to £11,000, and this will soon be returned to the investors in dividends when work is commenced and preliminary dead work done. I consider this the best mining investment and unworked property in Tasmania, and one of the soundest projects put before the public."

THE TASMANIAN TIN DREDGING CO.

Limited.

Incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, whereby the liability of Shareholders is limited to the amount of their Shares.

SHARE CAPITAL - - £50,000

Divided into 15,000 TEN PER CENT. CUMULATIVE PREFERENCE SHARES, and 35,000 ORDINARY SHARES of £1 each, of which 10,000 PREFERENCE SHARES are reserved for Working Capital, and have been subscribed and allotted, the remaining 5,000 Preference Shares, and all the Ordinary Shares have been allotted to the Vendor Syndicate in payment of the properties.

After payment of the Dividend on Preference Shares, the Ordinary Shares are to receive 10 per cent., and both Preference and Ordinary Shares are to rank rateably for surplus profits.

When 100 per cent. in dividends has been paid on the Preference Shares issued they are to be converted into Ordinary Shares.

The Company was incorporated in November, 1897, the whole of the Working Capital of 10,000 Preference Shares being subscribed and allotted.

The Company owns six Crown dredging leases, granted by the Tasmanian Government, and comprising 237½ chains or about three miles of the bed and channel of the Ringarooma River, with the tin drift and tailings therein, estimated at about 1,000,000 cubic yards, at a part where the river has for the last twenty years formed the sole discharge and sludge channel for the tin wash and tailings of the leading tin sluicing mines of the Ringarooma Tin-field in the North-east Mineral Field of Tasmania, passing through and adjoining the Triangle, the North Brothers' Home, the Krushkas, the Krushkas Brothers' Home, the Brothers' Home No. 1, the New Brothers' Home Amalgamated Lease, the Briseis, and other tin mines on the Cascade and Main Creeks, and receiving the lost tin from the sluicing of the Arba, Ormuz, Ruby Flat, Ringarooma Valley, and other mines, collected and held in this part of the river by the rocky bed and the natural bars running across the river near the Brothers' Home and the Main Creek.

The properties and tailings have been reported upon by Mr. J. G. Stitt, M.M.S.; Mr. C. K. Sheard, Memb.Inst.C.E., late Government Superintending Engineer Public Works Department, Tasmania; Mr. C. E. Riley, Manager East Hercules Gold Mining Company, Mount Reid; Messrs. John Campbell and J. Kennelly, Mining Engineers, Zeehan; and reference is made to the Tasmanian Government Geological Reports of A. Montgomery, Esq., M.A., and G. Thurean, Esq., F.G.S., Government Geological Surveyors, published by order of the Minister of Mines.

Particulars of an issue of fully-paid Ten per Cent. Preference Shares, by arrangement with the Vendor Syndicate, to cover costs of purchase options upon additional dredging properties recommended by Mr. Sheard can be obtained from the Secretary.

The NEW BULTFONTEIN MINING COMPANY,

Limited.

Registered as a Limited Liability Company under Act 25, 1892, of the Cape Colony.

CAPITAL £275,000, in 275,000 Ordinary Shares of £1 each.
ISSUED CAPITAL ... ... £242,500.
Issue of
£50,000 Six Per Cent. First Mortgage Debentures in Bonds of £50 each.
To be secured by first mortgage of all the landed property, buildings, plant and machinery of the Company.

The Debentures will be issued at par, and be repayable at 103 in five annual drawings of £10,000 each and the premium of 3 per cent., commencing on September 1st, 1901, and terminating on September 1st, 1905, or by purchases in the market if below par, or by giving six months' notice at any time after the expiration of two years from date hereof the Company may repay the then outstanding Debentures at 105. Holders of Debentures will have the option until 26th April, 1900, on giving seven days' notice, of converting one moiety of their holding at their nominal value, into Ordinary Shares, at the rate of £1 5s. per Share, that is to say, a holder of Debentures to the value of £100 would be entitled to exchange £50 of such Debentures for 50 Ordinary Shares on payment of an additional £12 10s. Should this option be exercised the amount of the annual drawings will be correspondingly reduced.

In the event of the Company going into voluntary liquidation before the 25th of April, 1900, the Debentures will be repayable at 103.

The Directors invite applications for the above issue at par, payable as follows:—

20 per cent. on Application;
30 per cent. on Allotment;
25 per cent. on 14th June;
25 per cent. on 14th July.

The issue will be secured by a first mortgage bond in favour of the Trustees, and duly registered in the Deeds Registry Office in Cape Colony, upon all the landed property, mining claims and water rights, dams and reservoirs, buildings, machinery and fixed plant of every description belonging to the Company. These are all in good working order, and the buildings and surface works in good repair. There will also be a floating charge over the whole of the undertaking and assets of the Company.

The Debentures will bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly on 1st September and 1st March, and the first coupon will be payable 1st March, 1899.

Interest on payments, calculated from date of allotment and the dates of subsequent instalments, will accrue at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum to the 31st August, and will be paid when the provisional scrip is exchanged for definitive bonds on or about 1st September, 1898.

The Debentures will be to bearer, with coupons attached, which will be paid at the Offices of the Company in Kimberley, or at the London Office, 6½, Austin Friars, E.C.

PROSPECTUS.

The New Bultfontein Mining Company was incorporated in 1895, under the Laws of the Cape Colony, to purchase and work 58 claims in the Bultfontein Diamond Mine. By subsequent amalgamation with the Bultfontein Central Mines and the Bultfontein Premier Diamond Mining Company an additional 90 claims were acquired, making a total of 148 claims or thereabouts. These claims form a compact block in the Bultfontein Diamond Mine, adjoining claims belonging to the Consolidated Bultfontein Mine and the De Beers Consolidated Mines, Limited.

In June, 1896, it was decided to adopt the underground system of working, whereby the danger of stoppage and damage from falls of reef and ground under the old open-air method would be done away with, and £75,000 was provided by the Shareholders for that purpose. These works have comprised the sinking of a main shaft 648½ feet deep, the driving of a main tunnel, 11 feet wide by 8 feet high, at the 600 feet level from the shaft to the blue ground, a distance of 823 feet through solid quartzite rock, the erection of a 60 feet steel lattice head-gear over the main shaft and a 120-h.p. winding engine, guaranteed capable of hoisting 3,000 loads of blue ground per day of 12 hours, as well as the necessary boilers, buildings, pumps, and other plant and gear, in addition to the general development of the Mine at the various levels down to the 600 feet.

The above works are now all complete and paid for. According to cable advice received from the Head Office in Kimberley, the new machinery started running on the 11th instant and is working well, and the Company is now in a position to do large and regular work, and it is with a view to depositing on the floors an adequate reserve stock of blue ground that the Directors have recommended, and the Shareholders have sanctioned, this issue of Debentures.

During the year 1896 dividends amounting to 20 per cent. were paid, but during 1897, owing to a heavy fall of reef and the hindrances arising therefrom, and the interference caused by the laying out and preparation for the execution of the new works, the hauling and washing was only on a small scale. Production has, however, commenced from blue ground taken out of the mine during the course of development, and the results obtained go to prove the value of the underground system as compared with the open-air method, the yield from this ground for the past three months having been about 28 carats per 100 loads, as against 19 or 20 carats under the old system. The Company has, during the same period, only been working about 5,000 loads per week, which shows a fair ratio of profit, and with the completion of the shaft and machinery it is estimated that the quantity washed can be gradually increased to three times the present output. This production should, it is calculated, enable the Company to earn profits sufficing to provide interest on, and a Sinking Fund for the redemption of, the present issue of Debentures, and leave a handsome balance for Dividends on the Ordinary Share Capital and the provision of Reserve and Depreciation Funds.

A copy of the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company and the draft Trust Deed securing the Debentures can be seen at the Offices of the Company, 6½, Austin-friars, London, E.C., where the Prospectus and Forms of Application can be obtained.

Applications for Debentures on the enclosed Form may be sent to to Company's Bankers, together with cheque for the application money.

Failure to pay any instalment will render previous payments liable to forfeiture.

Provisional scrip will be issued against letters of allotment and cash receipts, and will be exchanged for definitive Debentures on and after 1st September, 1898.

Where no allotment is made, the application money will be returned in full; and when the number of Debentures allotted is less than those applied for, the surplus will be credited to the account of future payments.

Application will be made to the Stock Exchange for a quotation in their Official List.

22nd April, 1898.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,005.

As the Pall Mall Gazette truly remarked in a recent paragraph:—

"There have been many definitions of a gentleman. Among them was a famous one by a celebrated actress, 'A man who can wear a clean collar without looking conspicuous;' but the latest which the Marylebone County Court gave us yesterday deserves, says the Telegraph, to rank among the best. At the hearing of a judgment summons, the judge asked what trade the defendant followed. His Honour was informed that he was a builder. 'But on my copy of the summons,' said the judge, 'he is described as a butcher.' Hereupon the Registrar said that on his copy the defendant was described as a tailor. Then came the definition, which deserves to live, given by the plaintiff: 'He is more like a gentleman than anything else. He walks about all day doing nothing, going from public-house to public-house.'"

It has been suggested to me that an interesting competition may be secured by asking the readers of TRUTH to try their hands at defining, in a similar way, what a gentleman is. The usual weekly prize of Two Guineas is therefore offered for

THE BEST HUMOROUS DEFINITION OF A GENTLEMAN.

Competitors may send in more than one definition if they please; and all answers must reach me by the morning of Monday, May 9, at the latest.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on post-cards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand; whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The winners of Prizes Nos. 986 and 989 have not yet made formal application for the Prizes awarded to them. As it is necessary for this formal application to be made before cheques can be sent, I shall be glad to hear from ROUGHTY and SCOTUS VIATOR at their earliest convenience.

 The real name, with the address, of W. NEVERMORE, winner of Prize No. 993, is Morton Luce, Esq., 45, Upper Belgrave-road, Clifton, Bristol.

 The real name, with the address, of ROSALYS, winner of Prize No. 997, is Mrs. R. A. Knox, 28, Bisham-gardens, Highgate, N.

 The real name, with the address, of CRERAN, winner of Prize No. 995, is G. K. Webster, Esq., 6, Pembridge-crescent, Bayswater, W.

W. NEVERMORE.—Many thanks for your suggestion.

J. W. ST. G. H.—I am much obliged to you for your letter. As you will have seen, I placed all competitors on a similar footing with regard to the misprints which occurred.

JANET H.—Many thanks for the trouble you took, and for the list you sent me.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE Queen comes to town on Monday next, and her Majesty will spend two or three nights at Buckingham Palace. This will probably be the Queen's last visit to London during the present year.

Some of the papers appear to have been made uneasy by the informality of the visit of President Faure to the Queen at Cimiez, both as to the etiquette of the meeting, and in the matter of his costume. These journals do not appear to understand that the Queen maintained a strict incognita all the time she was on the Continent, being everywhere known as Countess of Balmoral. If the Queen had not been incognita, all the Imperial and Royal personages who came to see her would have been obliged to appear in full uniforms, with stars and ribbons, and their visits must have been returned with all the formalities which etiquette requires from a travelling Sovereign.

There will be a State Ball and a State Concert at Buckingham Palace shortly before Whitsuntide, according to present arrangements, but the dates of these functions will not be fixed until after the Prince of Wales has conferred with the Queen on the subject. The second Ball and the second Concert will not take place until the beginning of July. These are to be the only Palace entertainments for this year, as the Queen does not intend to give a garden party, and there is not likely to be one at Marlborough House.

A paragraph has gone round the papers which states that at next week's Drawing Room the number of débutantes will be restricted to two hundred. This is nonsense. It is the number of presentations which is restricted to two hundred, and there is no reference whatever to "débutantes" in the Lord Chamberlain's new regulations. Any one who may in future make an "irregular" presentation will ipso facto be permanently banished from Court, and a similar penalty will be inflicted for the offence (which has been scandalously common) of receiving payment for presenting a person.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are to make Marlborough House their headquarters until Saturday, the 28th, when they will go to Sandringham for about ten days.

Princess Henry of Prussia has left her residence at Kiel for an absence of several months. Princess Henry, who is now on a visit to the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Hesse at Darmstadt, is to arrive at Windsor Castle from Germany on Wednesday, May 18, and two days later she will accompany the Queen to Balmoral. With her two children she will probably spend the months of July and August in the Isle of Wight, in which case they are to occupy Osborne Cottage, which will be lent to them by the Queen.

An evening paper states that Lord Strafford "has resigned his position as Equerry to the Queen." This is incorrect. On becoming a Peer, Sir Henry Byng ceased ipso facto to hold the office of Equerry-in-Ordinary to her Majesty, to which he was appointed in February, 1874 having previously been for several years one of the Grooms-in-Waiting to the Queen. Lord Strafford's career in the Household commenced when he was a boy, as he was appointed a Page-of-Honour through the interest of his mother, Lady Agnes Byng, who was one of "the favoured Pagets," being a daughter of F.M. Lord Anglesey, who lost a leg at Waterloo. It is expected that Lord William Cecil will replace Sir Henry Byng as Equerry. He has been a Groom-in-Waiting to the Queen for several years past, and is also Equerry to Princess Beatrice.

A very good set of apartments in Hampton Court Palace has been placed at the disposal of the Queen by the death of the Dowager Lady Desart, who had resided there for many years. She was formerly a Lady of the Bedchamber to her Majesty for a long time. It is very probable that this apartment will be offered by the Queen to Lady Granville, who now has rooms at Kensington Palace.

Lord and Lady Cadogan entertained a large party of visitors, including most of the members of their family, at the Viceregal Lodge during Punchestown week. On Tuesday and Wednesday their Excellencies, their guests, and a Viceregal suit attended the national race meeting in State, driving up the course to the grand-stand enclosure, escorted by the Master of the Kildare Hunt and others on horseback. On Friday and Saturday the Leopardstown Races encountered disastrous weather, notwithstanding which the Viceroy heroically attended them with a party. On Thursday night a dance was given at the Viceregal Lodge, to which the elect of Society were invited. Lady Cadogan was put into mourning owing to the sudden death of her relative, Lord Caledon. In addition to the Punchestown party, Lord Enniskillen and Lord and Lady Rossmore joined the visitors at the Viceregal Lodge on Thursday.

Sir Valentine Knightley, who died last week, inherited the baronetcy and the estates of his cousin, Lord Knightley. He was a very popular country clergyman in Northamptonshire, and held two family livings in that county for more than sixty years. The Knightleys were long the leaders of the Tory Party in Northamptonshire, and Fawsley was to that party what Althorp was to the Whigs.

Sir Frederick Milbank was one of Mr. Gladstone's oldest friends, and never had any statesman a more enthusiastic and unswerving supporter. Where Mr. Gladstone led the way Sir Frederick was quite content to follow, and he was a staunch Liberal down to the end of his life, although his son sits for Radnorshire as a Tory. He represented the North Riding for twenty-one years, and was very popular in the House of Commons among men of all parties.

Sir Frederick was a country gentleman of the very best type, being a generous and considerate landlord, a kindly and hospitable neighbour, and a good friend to the poor in all ways. He was universally beloved and respected in the North Riding, and was an immense favourite, among the dalesmen in particular. Ten years ago some of Sir Frederick's tenants complained of the high rates which they were obliged to pay, whereupon he decided to pay them himself, which meant a loss to him of over £1,000 a year. He was a keen sportsman, and took a hearty delight in the moorland country round Barningham Park, where he died. Sir Frederick was one of the finest shots ever known, and he may be said to have invented the art of grouse driving. Some of his shooting feats are unparalleled in the annals of gunnery, notably his famous day on Wemmergill Moor, in August, 1872, when he himself killed 728 grouse in eight drives, using three guns.

The Richmond Horse Show, an event which is every year growing in popularity, is to be held on June 10 and 11, in the Old Deer Park. The Committee announce a very handsome list of prizes, the total value being about £1,100.

The advent of the lady gardener has naturally been received with some misgivings by the sons of Adam, and certain members of the aggrieved class have asked me to voice their misgivings. Experience causes me to fear and tremble when expressing anything like a doubt about the fitness of women for any work or duty that she has a fancy to take up; but I must say that there seems to me to be some common sense on the side of the man gardeners in this matter. A certain Horticultural Association put their case as follows, apropos of statements that have appeared in the Press with reference to the employment of ladies passing out of the women's branch of the Horticultural College, Swanley:—

If it were a question of the young lady in the florist's shop or any similar position, we should not attempt to lodge the protest which we ask your permission to do, but when it is reported that a woman has been sent out from a particular college where she has in the space of three years or so acquired all the knowledge necessary to take charge of a well-kept public or private garden in all its cultural details, we confess we wonder whether this is a fact or a fiction going the round of the Press. It seems to us ridiculous to suppose that, after training received at this establishment, half of which amounts to theory, any person can be capable of adjudicating upon the work of a veteran grower in a private garden, say a kitchen gardener, or a fruit foreman, who, during his long experience, has had to plant, transplant, and handle in cultural detail, more plants, trees, or shrubs than some of the students in such a college have ever seen. To make a practical gardener it is necessary for the individual to pass through all the various stages of work, including digging, trenching, and other laborious items, and no one can be a competent and qualified judge of good workmanship, and the time required for each operation and other details, without such experience. If the women students that have been sent out to occupy positions in the country tell us that they have passed through such a training, all we say is that they must be very exceptional representatives of their sex. The work of a gardener is most heavy and laborious. He has to work in the open air under all sorts of climatic conditions, and he has to endure frequent changes of temperature from the hot-house to outside departments, which we find require a constitution of iron to stand.

In our opinion the time has arrived when it behoves every gardener to make himself heard individually and by organisation in defence of his profession. In conclusion, we would add that it seems to us a just grievance that a college for producing such results should be promoted, and I think we are right in saying that it is so, under the combined management of three County Councils. If technical education grants are to become the means whereby hard-working gardeners, after spending years in their business, are to be supplanted by a youthful feminine population, the money thus granted had far better be diverted to other channels where the working men, who, as British taxpayers, help to find the money, will receive a share of the benefit.

Not being a gardener, I hesitate to identify myself with all the sentiments above expressed. I confess, however, that I should hesitate to engage as a head gardener a young lady who had only qualified by three years' training in some horticultural college. No doubt she would have her advantages in some respects over the traditional head-gardener. I should expect her, for instance, to be a little more ready than that functionary to recognise my proprietary rights in the produce of my own ground and hot-houses. But I should not expect from her the same knowledge of all the practical details of gardening work, I should not expect her to be up to all the tricks of the gardening trade, and I should not expect the under-gardeners to take very kindly to her in the position of a foreman or forewoman. If this applies to a private establishment, it would seem to apply equally to a public one; and if it is true that ladies have been appointed to such positions in public gardens, I can only say that those public authorities who have taken this step are bold men.

A correspondent writes :—

Surely in your remarks in your issue of the 28th as to sending invitations with a halfpenny stamp, both you and your correspondent miss the point.

It is not that a penny stamp is a greater compliment to the guest than a halfpenny one, but to send an invitation fastened up so as to be read only by the addressee is more seemly than to send one in an open envelope, so that any one may read it.

I did not miss this point, but I did not think it worth noticing. Judging by what I see in my friends' houses—especially in bachelors' quarters—the first desire of those who receive invitations is that all their acquaintance should read them. Many people literally paper their mantel-shelves, looking-glasses, and picture frames with their invitations, especially when the hosts or hostesses are blessed with titles. In making the invitation as public as possible, therefore, the host would seem to be consulting his guests' probable wishes. And even if the guest is ashamed of the invitation, is it for the host to assume that he will be? If not, why is it "more seemly" of him to seal up the envelope?

There was no abatement in the newsboy nuisance in London last Sunday afternoon. Notwithstanding the complete absence of anything in the shape of news, and the deserted condition of the streets owing to the continuous rain, ruffians of all ages were bawling evening papers about all parts of the West End from mid-day to 9 or 10 p.m. It may be some encouragement to those who suffer from this annoyance to know that they are very strong in numbers, as is shown by the quantity of letters that I have received—all in the same indignant strain. I recommend all those who feel strongly on the subject to communicate with Sir Edward Bradford, who would, no doubt, be ready to deliver London from this plague if he felt that there was a demand for his intervention.

It would not be quite fair, perhaps, to point to the prices realised at the recent sale of the Renton Collection at Messrs. Christie's as an evidence of the increasing value of British art work; but, however exceptional the circumstances may have been, there is no getting away from the fact that five pictures by the late Sir John Millais changed hands for the by no means inconsiderable sum of 10,600 guineas. One of these, "The Order of Release," which in 1879 was sold by Messrs. Christie at the Arden auction for £2,835, now realised 5,000 guineas, whilst the equally well-known "Black Brunswicker," sold in the Plint sale in 1852 for £819, was not knocked down until the biddings had reached 2,650 guineas. Of late years it has become the custom to hold an important art sale at Messrs. Christie's rooms on the day of the Royal Academy banquet; and this circumstance, coupled with the fact that four of the pictures in question had been exhibited in the recent Millais Exhibition at Burlington House, may, to some extent, have accounted for these record prices.

Of course the "biograph" is to follow in the wake of the war correspondent, and I see that the patrons of the Palace Theatre are soon to be regaled with living pictures of the naval operations off Cuba, taken from a special yacht which is following the American fleet. No doubt we shall see very striking developments in this direction before long. I suppose that when British troops next take the field we shall have their battles fought over again by the cinematograph at the music halls, and possibly we may yet have some adaptation of the electrophone which will enable us to sit at home and listen to the noises of the battlefield, the firing of the guns, and the groans of the wounded. Could anything be more fascinating?

The London Stereoscopic Company have made me an offer which will, I am sure, be greatly appreciated by all those kind-hearted ladies among my readers who are good enough to make up scrap-books in connection with the TRUTH Toy Distribution. The Stereoscopic Company offer to present sufficient photographs and photographic prints to fill 200 scrap-books, and if sufficient ladies are forthcoming, the Company hold out a hope that they may be able to find even more materials. The books should be foolscap size, with fifty leaves in each, or less. A number of small books will be more useful than a few large ones, as many of the photographs are duplicates, while some are printed in sheets containing six or eight all alike. It is early yet to speak of the next TRUTH Toy Show, but I feel sure there are many ladies who would be glad to take in hand a job of this kind at any time of the year; and if any who are prepared to fill books will communicate with me at once, I will arrange to have the photographs forwarded to them. Such books, I may say, are not intended to be presented to individual children, but will be given to the wards of the hospitals and workhouse infirmaries for the general use of the occupants.

The newly-published volumes of Sir M. E. Grant-Duff's "Notes from a Diary," are very much more interesting and lively than the earlier ones. The pages are full of good stories and bright sayings, but it is a pity that the author did not give more of such extracts, and omit his account of foreign towns. There is a capital story (1880) of a conversation between Lord Beaconsfield and a member of his Party who had expressed disappointment at being only knighted. "I assure you," said the Premier, "you altogether underrate the honour of knighthood. It satisfied Sir Walter Raleigh and Sir Isaac Newton."

In Mrs. Ritchie's interesting preface to the excellent new edition of "Vanity Fair" she gives an astonishing instance of ineptitude and bathos in a quotation from a letter received by Thackeray in 1848 from a lady who had just lost a child :—"If anything can console his father it is this heavenly weather!!"

It is just fifty years since the foundation of Queen's College, London, the first college open to women in this country. I have been asked to mention that in commemoration of this Jubilee a volume of "Records and Memories" has been published under the title of "The First College for Women," and that it is on sale for the benefit of the building extension fund. The book has been edited by Mrs. Alec Tweedie, and in addition to a reprint of the lecture in which the Rev. F. O. Maurice, one of the founders, described the objects and methods of the institution, it contains a résumé by Miss Croudace of the work that has been accomplished, and papers on a variety of topics by Mrs. Beerbohm Tree, Dr. Sophia Jex-Blake, Miss Adeline Sergeant, and many other former students.

There have been an extraordinary number of failures in the First Year Examinations at Durham University, which were held a fortnight ago. Fifty per cent. of the candidates in theology were rejected, while in arts the failures were about sixty per cent.

Lord Leven and Melville has been appointed Lord High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and much consternation has been excited among the ministers and elders of the Kirk by the announcement in one of the Edinburgh newspapers that he is going to discontinue the large dinner parties which have been given every night at Holyrood during the session of the Assembly to the members thereof. For these dinners it is stated that Lord Leven and Melville proposes to substitute a series of firework displays, and several large garden parties are to be given besides. This will be a most unpopular "innovation," and the attendance of the "fathers and brethren" of the Kirk is likely to be considerably diminished during the approaching Assembly. The Holyrood dinners have been (as a Scotch paper puts it) "among the chief joys of Zion," and the prospect of sitting at a semi-Royal table has attracted to Edinburgh a large number of members who otherwise would have remained in their own homes.

The Archbishop of Canterbury is to be in Edinburgh for a day or two during the session of the Assembly, and it is stated that Dr. Temple will be the first Anglican prelate who has attended the debate. This is nonsense. Archbishop Tait was present at one or two meetings of the Assembly about twenty years ago, and in 1890 Bishop Thorold attended on more than one occasion, and was in the hall during the delivery of the Moderator's closing address.

It may be hoped that Lord George Hamilton will make a worthy appointment to the See of Calcutta, for Bishop Johnson will be a difficult man to succeed, as he has shown exceptional ability and tact in his government of this important See, and has been eminently discreet in his dealings with the other Anglican prelates in India. After the Secretary of State's eccentric selection for the See of Bombay, my hopes and my expectations certainly do not run together; but possibly Lord Salisbury may now have something to say in the matter.

Two exceptionally good preachers, who are not often heard in London, will occupy the pulpit of Westminster Abbey next Sunday; Dr. Ince, Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, and Canon of Christ Church, preaching in the morning, and the Bishop of Winchester in the evening.

Canon Scott, Vicar of St. John's, Leeds, has accepted the important living of Wanstead, Essex, which is of the net value of over £700 a year, with house. Wanstead is in the gift of Lord Cowley, but it is understood that the presentation for this turn was sold some time ago. Canon Scott has been beneficed in Yorkshire for more than thirty years, and he is widely known in the north as a most active and popular parish clergyman, who has enjoyed the esteem of all classes, parties, and sects. He will be sorely missed at Leeds, where he came from Hull in 1883.

By way of rejoinder to the report of the Committee of Canterbury Convocation on the grievances of curates, Dr. Thackeray has worked out some elaborate statistics in justification of his original estimate of the number of unemployed clergymen. There are great difficulties in the way of arriving at a correct figure, but the statistics given by Dr. Thackeray certainly point to the conclusion that the number of unemployed clerics in the Southern Province is considerably in excess of the 2,000 mentioned by the Committee. The report is to be discussed when Convocation meets next week. Perhaps more light may then be thrown upon this point, and also upon the methods by which the Committee satisfied themselves that there are only seventy-three unemployed clergymen in the Southern Province who desire work as assistant curates.

A reader, who has been studying the recent remarks in these columns on the misapplication of parochial Church revenues, has written to point out that it is not only in thinly-populated country parishes that incumbents are paid out of all proportion to their work; the same thing may be seen in the City of London. True. We must, of course, not forget the City churches whenever it comes to "pooling" the endowments.

The Vicar of Hurley, near Marlow, has explained why he refused to vote for the Tory candidate at the recent election in East Berks. It was solely in consequence of Captain Young's "views on marriage." Says his reverence:—

If England were sinking in mid-ocean, and only the election of an advocate of the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill could save her, I couldn't (not only wouldn't) vote for any man who might declare himself in favour of that terrible measure. We had last month no candidate for whom any one in favour of maintaining the marriage laws could, with decency, vote at all.

The Deceased Wife's Sister Bill has been responsible for many wild outbursts of stupid bigotry, but none, I should think, wilder than this.

The Vicar of All Souls', Clive Vale, Hastings, has somewhat strange ideas of the influence that he ought to exercise over those who have the right to vote for the people's churchwarden. At a recent meeting of the Vestry, a gentleman said that people would not go to the poll because they were afraid of the crack of the priest's whip. He replied that he was glad to know that there were still some people who follow the teaching of the Prayer Book, and carry themselves humbly before their spiritual pastors and masters.

The world is so large that it is only fair that every one should have an opportunity of expressing his opinion; but what always strikes me as so singular is the large-hearted toleration of the majority, as compared with the meddlesome insistence of the minority. For instance, an organisation, which styles itself the Lord's Day Observance Society, has recently held its sixty-seventh annual meeting; its numbers may be gathered from the fact that, after all those years, its subscriptions amount to the important sum of £215, whilst the result of a special appeal for funds, sent out at the beginning of the present year, realised exactly £128. Yet this handful of people, presumably free from any inclinations to avail themselves of Sunday relaxation, would stop all Sunday trains—excursion or otherwise; would have all national museums, &c., rigorously closed; and "learns with thankfulness that Lord Hobhouse's Sunday Bill was again defeated in the House of Lords." What martyrs they would become were the great majority to clamour for a Bill insisting that they should visit at least one national museum every Sunday of their lives! And yet the converse of this is what they seek.

It is indeed disheartening to find that after all that has been shown of the folly and mischief of snowball collections, a clergyman of the Established Church and his churchwardens should resort to this means of raising money. The cleric who has been guilty of this enormity is the Rev. S. J. McNulty, Vicar of Quarry Bank, Brierley-hill, Staffordshire. The chain letter is written in the name of the Vicar and churchwardens, and the money is to be sent to the Vicar. Each recipient of the letter is asked to forward two or three stamps and to forward three copies of the letter to friends. As I remarked the other day, it seems high time that it was made a criminal offence to originate and carry on a snowball collection, for no milder measure seems likely to have the slightest effect upon the idiots who engage in these schemes.

The current number of the Hospital contains a crushing indictment of the Queen's Jubilee Hospital in the shape of a report upon the premises and working arrangements by Dr. Solomon Smith. Sir Henry Burdett long ago pronounced the building to be utterly unfit for the purpose of a hospital, and declared that the local sanitary authorities ought to deal with it. The answer to this on behalf of the hospital was, if I remember rightly, that Sir Henry Burdett knows nothing about hospitals. It remains to be seen whether the same argument will be applied to Dr. Solomon Smith; but as the Doctor's report is chiefly a plain statement of facts and figures, and as such opinions as he expresses are studiously cautious and moderate, it will require something more than personalities to refute his verdict. This is how he sums up the case:—

> Is it right that patients should be taken for serious surgical treatment into a house which only offers in one of its wards between four and five hundred cubic feet of space per bed, and in another between five and six hundred—in both cases below the minimum enforced in every barrack in the country, and far below what is provided in many workhouse infirmaries? And I would further ask, Is it right that such an institution as I have, I hope, honestly and fairly described should go before the public as a hospital, and should as such ask for support, when the standard of the provision it makes for its patients differs in so striking a degree from that which obtains in those great institutions to which the giving public rightly attaches the honoured name of "Hospital?" . . . . To any one accustomed to the wards of our great hospitals, or even of many of our workhouse infirmaries, there is something positively shocking in calling this squalid little house a hospital. . . . .

As mentioned in TRUTH some months back, I have entered into a sort of armistice, through the kind offices of the Editor of Lloyd's Newspaper, with the present management of the Jubilee Hospital. I am, therefore, under some difficulty in offering any remarks of my own upon the subject. The compact, however, only goes to this: that, in consideration of the Editor of Lloyd's having undertaken to keep his editorial eye on the management, and gone bail for the good behaviour of the managers, I agreed to draw a veil over the past, and let the charity stand on its own merits for the future. Judging from Dr. Solomon Smith's statements, if its own merits are all that the hospital has to stand on, its downfall must be at hand, and no one will suffer thereby—unless it is Mr. Benham. In all seriousness, I would point out to the Editor of Lloyd's, and every one else connected with the concern, that it is quite impossible to wink at the continued existence of such a state of things as the Hospital describes. The Jubilee Hospital must be either mended or ended.

One of the most attractive charity entertainments of the season is to be given at Stafford House, on Wednesday afternoon next (11th inst.), on behalf of the Charing Cross Hospital Special Appeal. Among the contributors to the programme will be Madame Ella Russell, and Miss Clara Butt, Miss Marie Tempest, Miss Cissy Loftus, Miss Letty Lind, and Miss Louie Freear, Mrs. Brown Potter, Miss Ellaline Terriss, and Mr. Seymour Hicks, M. Johannes Wolff, and other distinguished lights of the musical and dramatic professions. The tickets are on sale at all the principal libraries. It is to be hoped that the result of the concert will be to finally extinguish the debt under which the Charing Cross Hospital has been labouring.

It is reported that at the present time there are not more than sixty Militia candidates preparing to enter the Army. The results of the last competitive examination of Militia subalterns were exceedingly unsatisfactory, and there are actually more vacancies than qualified candidates.

The insufficient supply of these Militia candidates is probably an unavoidable result of the shortness of the Militia establishments in respect of officers. I discussed last week the defective establishment of the Militia generally, but the deficiency is even more marked when one comes to look into the statistics of officers. The total establishment of the Militia below the commissioned ranks was for last year 130,095; the nominal establishment of officers was 3,487. The number below the commissioned ranks "wanting to complete the establishment" was 19,202, while the number of officers wanting to complete the establishment was 739. It will be seen from this that whereas the percentage of N.C.O.s and men short of the establishment was about 14·76, the percentage of officers short was 21·19. There were also 379 officers absent from last year's training, 364 with leave, 15 without.

As with the rank and file, so with the officers, the number short of the establishment varies enormously in different regiments. There are some few regiments only one, two, or three officers short of their proper complement, while in other cases the number runs up to 14 or 15. The 4th Lancashire Fusiliers were actually 15 officers short of their proper establishment of 23; that is to say, the battalion had only eight officers to over 800 men. The 3rd Battalion of the same regiment was 14 officers short on an establishment of 28, and the total strength of this battalion is about 200 above that of the 4th. The 3rd Battalion Manchester Regiment was 13 officers short on an establishment of 23. The 3rd Battalion Welsh Regiment (a battalion nominally 1,347 strong) was short of 16 officers on an establishment of 33; and so on. These figures are ugly enough, looking only at the question of the efficiency of the Militia; but they become very much more serious when one remembers the extent to which the Regular Army depends upon the Militia for its supply of officers.

In regard to the Permanent Staffs, I remarked last week that many of them are "veterans of little use in active service." A good instance in support of this is to be found at Beverley, where there are at present two sergeants, each with about forty-five years' service to his credit. Presumably both these warriors must be upwards of sixty years of age. On what principle men of this age can be reckoned as "on the strength" of any military force, I fail to understand.

Recently the battalion to which the above-mentioned veterans belong (the 3rd East Yorkshire) has been reduced by two companies, leaving two colour-sergeants and two sergeants to be absorbed into other battalions. These men have now been all disposed of in different directions. One of them, a married sergeant with two children, was sent to join the 2nd Battalion at Tipperary. But it never seems to have occurred to anybody in authority to create vacancies at the Depot by eliminating the two old warriors who began their soldiering about the time of the Crimean War.

I hear that the latest sartorial freak at Headquarters is a decision to abolish the Staff forage cap, and substitute for it what is described as "a hideous hybrid between the German forage cap and the cap of a Naval Officer." I believe I am right in saying that the old cap was a general favourite, and that the change is as unpopular as it is unnecessary. The only result of protests against these incessant changes of uniform is to make the War Office multiply their number. So delighted, apparently, is the head tailor with his decision to make artillery colonels wear red coats, while all under them continue to wear blue, that he is now going to make the Carabineers wear red in the field. We may expect to hear next that the Grenadiers are going to be dressed in grey, and that the "Blues" are to be turned into "Greens." There is a growing feeling of irritation and disgust at these changes, which have lately succeeded one another with such rapidity that no man in the Army knows what he will have to wear in a week's time; while it is generally agreed that every recent change that has been made is a change for the worse, and apparently designed in the interest of nobody but the military tailors, who profit by these changes at the expense of officers.

Is it not entirely contrary to the Regulations for an officer on full pay to be undertaking any other kind of work of a remunerative character? I ask in view of the fact that the Adjutant of a Militia battalion in the Channel Islands, being an officer on full pay of a Line regiment, appears to be practically carrying on a military coaching establishment at Guernsey. The objections to this are manifold. It is not right from the taxpayer's point of view that an officer on full pay should be spending several hours a day as a private coach. There are obvious objections to an officer who has to sign qualification certificates for candidates going before a Promotion Board, and who is also qualified to be a member of a Board of Examination, being actively engaged in the work of preparing candidates. Civilian coaches are also placed at a great disadvantage in competition with an officer occupying this position. Whether the thing is irregular or not, it ought to be stopped at once.

A question was asked in TRUTH of March 3 as to why a certain medical officer in Crete was occupying a portion of a house which does duty as a field hospital, while patients had on certain occasions been sleeping and treated in a corridor. Since the arrival in Crete of the number of TRUTH containing this question, I understand that the officer referred to has had a tent erected. He has not, however, removed his quarters. Does this by any chance point to the fact that he is supposed to be living under canvas?

It would be well, I think, if the Medical Staff arrangements at Canea were looked into by some superior military authority. For instance, the officer above referred to has, as his personal servant, a first-class orderly. The Medical Staff Corps Regulations forbid first-class orderlies to be employed in such billets, and very properly, for in this very case the result of a first-class orderly being thus employed is that patients in the hospital are in charge of second and third-class men. Again, the Royal Warrant for Pay distinctly says that corps pay shall not be issued to any N.C.O. or man while employed as an officer's servant. Nevertheless, the officer's servant above mentioned is, or was up to a recent date, in receipt of his ordinary corps pay.

Behind the question asked in Parliament last Friday as to the arrangements for enabling members to view the trooping of the colour on the Queen's Birthday there lies a curious little story. The Office of Works made the usual arrangements to erect a stand for the occasion on the Horse Guards Parade, and for the seats to be disposed of by the officers of the Brigade of Guards, who carry out the ceremony. No official communication, however, was made in the first instance to the War Office on the subject. In due course seats were offered by the Guards' officers in charge of the arrangements to members of both Houses of Parliament, and also to the War Office. In the latter case the reply came, through the Adjutant-General, that no such stand would be allowed to be erected. From the answer given in the House, I infer that the wrath of the exalted dignitary—whoever he may have been—whose wounded dignity thus asserted itself, has now been appeased. But is it not surprising that such very big people should give way to such very petty tempers?

Here is an incident which throws some light upon the frequent complaints of N.C.O.s respecting eccentricities in promotion. A man in a company of Royal Artillery at Quetta, who had duly qualified for promotion to bombardier and corporal, found two men had been promoted over his head, and interviewed his C.O. to inquire as to the reason for it. The C.O. replied that he acted solely on the information supplied to him — presumably by the sergeant-major. He then referred to the qualification returns, where he found against the complainant's name, under dates October, 1897, to February, 1898, the entry "Not smart enough on parade." In point of fact, during the whole of this time the complainant had been employed in the regimental institute, and had never been on parade at all. In a sense, of course, a man who had not been on parade might be described as "not smart enough on parade"; but if men are to be promoted solely on the sergeant-major's estimate of their qualifications, that functionary ought to record their qualifications with a little more accuracy than this.

One untoward result of the new messing allowance in the Army is to aggravate the grievance of the sergeant-major, Army Pay Corps. As warrant officers do not get the allowance, the quartermaster-sergeant's total pay is now brought up to 5s. 3d., or only 3d. less than the warrant officer's. This is a less difference than can be found between any other two grades, and it naturally causes the sergeant-major to feel that he is being unfairly treated as compared with the N.C.O.s below him. I would suggest that the best way to get over this would be to grant to warrant officers, Army Pay Corps, an increase of pay after one or two years' service, such as is already given in the case of corporals, sergeants, and quartermaster-sergeants. It is the more anomalous that a sergeant-major's pay in the Army Pay Corps does not increase with length of service, seeing that in this corps alone, out of all others in the Army, is the warrant officer denied any prospect of a commission.

A certain company of Royal Artillery at Bermuda is blessed with a sergeant-major who is inspired with a praiseworthy desire to improve the tone of Army conversation. He recently issued a company order directing N.C.O.s to suppress all cursing, swearing, and obscene language, and notifying that any man brought up for such an offence would be severely dealt with. A week or two afterwards, however, on parade the sergeant-major himself addressed the company in terms which I regret I cannot reproduce, with the result that there was an explosion of laughter in the ranks, and, according to a credible witness, a young lieutenant who was on parade "blushed up to the ears." The blushing subaltern should have reminded the sergeant-major that example is better than precept.

It has been suggested by a military correspondent that the extra dose of imprisonment and degradation awarded to Corporal Simpson for his alleged insobriety in St James's Park, may have been due to the fact that TRUTH sent a representative to the court-martial. I should be sorry to think this myself, but the author of the suggestion knows the Army better than I do. There is no doubt, I fear, that many men do suffer unjustly in the Service on mere suspicion, and wrongful suspicion, of communicating with the Press.

Of this I have lately had one or two striking instances. A paragraph appeared in TRUTH the other day which had reference to an order dealing with the case of a particular officer. The facts were sent to me by a correspondent in

For the DECORATING and FURNISHING in best modern manner, or in any of the traditional styles, of a single room or an entire house, HAMPTON & SONS, LTD., prepare, free of charge, suggestive schemes and competitive estimates.—Pall Mall East, S.W.

India, but the officer whose case was referred to happened to be in England, and he at once wrote, apparently in some alarm, to ask me for the name of my informant, for the purpose, as he explained afterwards, of defending himself in case he should ever subsequently be accused of having communicated the facts to TRUTH. Again, a paragraph having appeared in TRUTH respecting a particular military station, an officer formerly stationed there, but now retired, wrote to me expressing his delight to see that TRUTH still had a correspondent at that particular place, as he had been accused, while in the Service, of supplying me with information. He had never been able to clear himself of the suspicion, and he seemed to think that he had suffered in consequence of it. He remarked that if a return could be compiled of all the men who suffered every year through being unjustly suspected of communicating with TRUTH, it would form a large and melancholy record.

Of course, it is not in my power, or that of any other editor to prevent this; but I must say that it reflects very little credit either on the common sense or the good feeling of those occupying positions of authority in the Army. Some worthy people seem to have an idea that TRUTH possesses an authorised representative in every corner of the British Empire, and every department of the Service. That idea is quite erroneous. It is not for me to divulge the secrets of the editor's room, but I don't mind going so far as to say that I doubt if a dozen men in the British Army have written to me a dozen times in the last twenty years; and if any one thinks that he has spotted a regular correspondent of TRUTH in any branch of the Service, he may take it from me that he is deluding himself.

As a general rule, I should advise any one desirous of discovering a correspondent of TRUTH to look in the most unlikely place he can possibly think of. Once I had a second-in-command who came in a great flurry to this office to obtain a disclaimer from me of having given certain information, he being convinced that the Colonel suspected him of communicating with me. As a matter of fact, my information had come from the Colonel himself, who had not left the office five minutes when the Major arrived. I have had one of the ornaments of the Headquarter Staff (not the present Commander-in-Chief) and another head of a War Office department, both in my office at the same time, each coming with some story about the other, each completely at a loss to know how I had found out certain facts about his particular branch, and each firmly convinced that some unfortunate subordinate had been giving him away. I had to get them into separate rooms, and manœuvre them out through different doors—mercifully, I have no to this office.

This sort of Box and Cox episode is an agreeable diversion in the otherwise monotonous life of an editor. If I were of an unprincipled disposition I might publish in a memoir—posthumous, of course—a catalogue of all the exalted personages who have at different times furnished information that has appeared in TRUTH. I do not know that it would do so much harm, for so many would be implicated that there would hardly be an innocent party left to complain. But do not be alarmed, my very good friends. I have no such intention. Your confidences are safe—at any rate, till the time comes when all secrets are revealed. I cannot help smiling, however, when I hear that some harmless and innocent individual has been identified as "a correspondent of TRUTH."

Here are a few more of Tommy's grievances which seem to merit a small place in the Military Pillory:—

2nd Battalion, Durham Light Infantry, Poona.—About 300 N.C.O.s and men of this regiment who have been engaged for some time on plague duty have, on returning to barracks, been ordered two, if not three, extra parades per day. They had been kept at these extra parades all through March. On what principle this order is made does not appear, but considering the dangerous and offensive character of much of the duty which the men have had to perform, it would have been more reasonable to have let them off a few parades on rejoining than to have given them extra work. No similar order has, I believe, been made in the case of other regiments which have had men on plague duty.

2nd Battalion, Highland Light Infantry, Karachi.—When this battalion went on service with the Malakand Field Force in August last, all the kits not taken on active service were packed and left behind at headquarters. When, after the campaign, they were sent on to the regiment at Karachi and to a detachment at Hyderabad (Sindh), it was found that the kits had been opened, and everything of value either abstracted or spoilt. The men have thus been robbed wholesale of large quantities of clothing, as well as letters, photographs, and other articles of no value to any one but the owners, but of considerable value to them. There has clearly been gross negligence on the part of those who had charge of the baggage, and whoever is responsible for it ought to be called to account. It would also seem that the men have a fair claim to compensation.

21st Lancers, Cairo.—A squadron of this regiment went last autumn on a march to Alexandria, a certain amount of clothing, such as overalls, jack-boots, &c., being packed and sent by train. It has since transpired that a sum of £33, representing the cost of sending this baggage to and from Alexandria, has been debited to the messing account. I would ask on what principle can the men's mess funds be charged with such an expenditure as this? As well might the cost of sending the regiment to the front on a campaign be charged to the same account.

Clare Artillery, Ennis.—The whole of the men assembled for preliminary drill (about 130) were on Saturday last ordered by the C.O. to go to confession, and were actually paraded and marched to chapel for the purpose, including the men of the Permanent Staff. This seems to have been done with a view to their receiving the Sacrament on Sunday, and possibly the C.O., looking at it in that light, considers that confession is in itself a form of "preliminary drill." The men, however, do not seem to have appreciated the C.O.s kindly interest in their spiritual welfare, and it would seem desirable that this officer should be informed that he wields merely a military, and not an ecclesiastical authority.

2nd Battalion Royal Welsh Fusiliers, Canea, Crete.—The two following punishments, awarded by a C.O. on the same morning, bear a striking resemblance to some of the inscrutable performances of the Great Unpaid:—(1) A party of N.C.O.s (four sergeants and one corporal) charged with breaking out of camp, remaining absent till 12.45 a.m., being in a public-house out of bounds, and refusing to quit when ordered by the International Police. Punishment: Severely reprimanded. (2) A private charged with a simple "drunk." Punishment: fined 2s. 6d., deprived of good conduct badge, confined to camp for ten days, and pass stopped for three months. With the loss of 1d. per day with good conduct badge for six months, this punishment involves a pecuniary penalty alone of at least 17s. 6d.

A few weeks back I asked a question with regard to the price of canteen stores charged to troops in the Soudan Expeditionary Force. A similar question may be asked with regard to the charges at a camp of exercise at the Pyramids to which all the troops in Egypt were recently sent. For instance, at this camp the price of beer was raised one halfpenny per quart, as compared with what it is at Cairo, and cigarettes one halfpenny per packet. Now, I am credibly informed that any native carrier would cart three barrels of beer to the camp for 5s., while thousands of cigarettes could have been carried for a few shillings, so that the additional prices charged are out of all proportion to the cost of carriage to the camp. I do not suppose that the extra profits thus made on the sales ever find their way back into Mr. Atkins' pocket; and it is therefore an utterly unjustifiable thing that he should be mulcted in this extent when he is sent out either to fight the foe or to exercise in a camp.

I referred last week to the suggestion of a police superintendent to a convicted thief that, as soon as he came out of prison, he should join the Army. Judging from a communication just received from an Infantry regiment in India, I should imagine that this advice has already been acted upon in not a few instances. The writer states a whole series of facts such as the following:—(1) A man who had just bought a new shirt and placed it in his box at 7 p.m., found on returning to the barrack-room at 9 p.m. that the box had been forced, and that the shirt was gone; (2) a man from a cavalry regiment drinking with certain men from the same infantry regiment found, on leaving his comrades, that he had been robbed of Rs. 80; (3) another man in the same regiment was robbed of Rs. 35 during the night. And so on. Does the C.O. of this battalion know anything of these facts? If not, they ought to be brought before him, for habitual thieving of this kind tends more than anything else to disgust respectable men with army life. For the comfort of our fellow-subjects North of the Tweed, I may mention that these incidents occurred in a Scotch battalion. It will no doubt serve to prove to Scotchmen that the Scotch regiments must be largely leavened with Englishmen and Irishmen.

Why is there not some general and uniform rule throughout the Army as to the terms on which permanent passes to stop out after tattoo shall be granted? A visitor to the theatre at Limerick the other day noticed one of three soldiers leaving about 9.30 p.m., and making a considerable disturbance in so doing. Subsequent inquiry showed that whereas the other two men belonged respectively to the Cavalry and Artillery, and had earned permanent passes by being three months clear of an entry, the third man, being in the Infantry, could only get a similar pass by keeping for twelve months clear of an entry, and consequently had to be back in barracks by 9.30. It was only last week that I gave some evidence as to the value that soldiers set upon small liberties of this kind, and I think it would be a good thing if the three months' qualification for a permanent pass were made universal.

There was some discussion in Parliament the other day about the accommodation for British troops at Ladysmith, Natal; and I may remark in passing that I have heard complaints on the same subject from a cavalry regiment stationed there. Judging, however, from some recent correspondence in the Cape Times respecting the condition of the camp of the cavalry force at Idutywa, the Imperial troops do not fare much worse in South Africa than the local forces. The truth is, I suppose, that there is no adequate camp and barrack accommodation in the South African colonies for such a large military force as is at present assembled there; and unless the garrison is speedily to be reduced—a consummation which I fear cannot be looked for while Mr. Chamberlain remains in office—measures ought to be taken at once to provide proper accommodation on an adequate scale.

The military authorities might with advantage look into the circumstances of the meat supply to the permanent staff of the Clare Artillery at Ennis. Some singular statements are made with reference to the inferiority of the meat, the insufficient quantity, and the vast amount of bone delivered. On a recent occasion it is alleged that there were less than three ounces of meat for each man. I confess that I always look upon complaints of this kind with a certain amount of distrust; but in this case the facts are peculiar, as it is alleged that the meat supply was perfectly satisfactory up to a recent date, when the butcher was changed; and it is also stated that the former butcher gave up the contract because he could not continue to supply the meat under certain conditions which were imposed upon him. More than this I cannot say without sending a representative to Ennis to collect the necessary evidence; and I think it is only fair to the War Office to give them an opportunity of looking into the matter first for themselves.

Some two months back reference was made in TRUTH to an extraordinary story sent home by a soldier who had gone out to Ceylon with a draft of the Loyal North Lancashire Regiment. The story was contained in a letter written by this man to his friends in Lancashire, and it was sent to me by a gentleman in the neighbourhood who vouched for the truthfulness of the writer. These facts I stated in my paragraph, at the same time pointing out that the statements were of a nature to call for some sort of inquiry. They were to the effect that during the voyage of the ship, which turns out to have been the Borneo, a number of soldiers, irritated by the paucity and inferiority of the rations, broke into the bread-locker and seized 300 loaves; that some sort of riot followed, which ended in a number of the men being arrested and locked up for the rest of the voyage. I have now had a letter from an N.C.O. who went out with the draft, and who states that "the story is false in every particular." On the other hand, it appears that the matter has been inquired into by the Times of Ceylon, and the result, as shown in the issue of that paper for April 5, is far from establishing that the story was "false in every particular." On the contrary, it shows that there was some considerable foundation for the story, and that the facts are still far from clear.

The statement in the Times of Ceylon is that the rations were very scanty, and that the cook and baker of the first saloon did a thriving trade by selling sandwiches to the soldiers every evening. After the ship had been sixteen or seventeen days at sea, the cook reported that the bread locker had been broken open, and 300 loaves stolen. On the matter being reported to the officer commanding the troops, Major Jeffries, R.E., he threatened to put the troops on half rations until the value of the bread was made up. The troops retaliated by reporting the sale of sandwiches by the cook, and other irregularities, and the C.O., after having inquired further into the facts, expressed himself satisfied that the troops had not stolen the bread. This version of the facts appears to have been obtained by the Times of Ceylon from inquiries in the regiment, and the allegation of the soldiers is that the cook trumped up the story about the bread locker being broken into in order to hide the deficiency in the bread due to his own sales to the troops.

Now, I am not going to pronounce, on the very imperfect evidence to hand, which version of the facts is correct. But it is a curious fact that while the cook reported that the bread locker had been broken into and 300 loaves stolen, a soldier going out by the ship should have written home and given his friends a detailed account of the facts of the robbery. It may be that this young man is of an imaginative turn, and has added a little embroidery to the historical portion of his narrative. But it is not easy to see why he should have reported as true a statement which is now alleged to have been trumped up by the cook for the purpose of exonerating himself at the expense of the troops. This much, at any rate, is pretty clear, viz., that the rations were insufficient, and the provisions were sold to the troops to make up the deficiency. This was the chief point to which I called attention in my original paragraph. This alone would furnish sufficient ground for some inquiry, and such inquiry is the more called for in view of the charge made by the cook and its confirmation by one of the soldiers on board.

It may or may not be desirable that Irish sailors should decorate themselves with shamrock leaves on St. Patrick's Day—though common sense suggests that far more harm is likely to be done by forbidding the practice than can possibly result from permitting it. But whether the practice is desirable or not, nothing could be more calculated to create a bad impression throughout the Service than Mr. Goschen's answers in Parliament respecting the case of the man Pilkington. To say that this man was punished, not for wearing the shamrock, but for disobeying an order to remove it, is a pettifogging quibble unworthy of the shadiest attorney; and Mr. Goschen's request last Friday night that M.P.s shall abstain from asking questions on matters of discipline implies that, in the opinion of the First Lord and his colleagues, a man who takes service in the Navy thereby forfeits the protection of Parliament, as well as every other privilege of a free subject.

Whatever faults the War Office may possess—and it is my painful duty now and then to admit that it possesses some—it compares most favourably with the Admiralty in its amenability to public and Parliamentary opinion. "My Lords" do not merely claim infallibility and impeccability for themselves, but for all who are set in authority under them; and whenever a question is raised as to the rights of any individual in the Service you will find at the Admiralty nothing but resentment of outside criticism and determination to uphold official decrees through thick and thin. Never has this attitude been more conspicuous than under Mr. Goschen. His latest protest against the asking of questions in Parliament in relation to the maintenance of discipline is a most impudent extension of the new doctrine of the supremacy of Officialdom, and I trust there are not many M.P.s so weakminded as to heed it.

I hear that the whole of the signalling staff of H.M.S. Magnificent, some thirty petty officers, men, and boys, have had their leave stopped for upwards of a month in consequence of one man having made a mistake in reporting an evolution signal. The punishment was awarded by the Commander, who issued a decree that the leave should be stopped until the whole staff had passed an examination by him, which they seem to have had no opportunity of doing. This practice of imposing punishment indiscriminately on a large number of men on account of the act or default of one, seems to be only too common in the Navy. There is no more efficacious means of rendering men discontented or causing them to leave the Service at the earliest opportunity.

The decision of the Admiralty to waste nearly £8,000 in refitting the second-class composite-built cruiser Active, at Portsmouth, is severely criticised in Service circles, and with much justice, for she is a vessel of a quite obsolete type, and perfectly useless for all practical purposes. The Active has been a terribly expensive ship for the taxpayer. She was built on the Thames in 1867 for £132,100, and nearly £176,000 has since been expended in altering her and generally patching her up.

It will astonish people at home to hear that the Indian Government is still muddling about with the exchange compensation regulations. A recent letter in the Pioneer from "One of the Fleeced" states that people who were presumably intended to have the benefit of the new rules propagated last year have not yet been allowed to draw the allowance, "pending the preparation of certain lists." To show the muddle which exists at present, I have a case before me of two brothers, both born and brought up under exactly the same circumstances, but employed in different departments, one of whom has been for some time drawing the exchange compensation allowance without question, while the other has not yet been able to obtain it. Other cases of a similar kind have before now been mentioned in TRUTH. The cheeseparing niggardliness with which the Indian Government treats its employees is only equalled by the reckless extravagance with which it incurs huge expenditure on frontier aggressions and similar fatuities. There is probably no other Government which has ever so distinguished itself for penny wisdom and pound foolishness.

A truly enormous difference of judgment between two tribunals as to the punishment which would fit one and the same crime has been revealed in a recent appeal to the Madras High Court. The prisoners were two native officers, who were convicted of unnecessarily and recklessly firing at some coolies during a trumpery quarrel, with the result that one man was killed. At the original trial before the Sessions Judge at Tinnevelly the officer who gave the order to fire was awarded one year's imprisonment, and the constable who carried out the order one day's imprisonment. These sentences were appealed against by the Public Prosecutor on the ground of their inadequacy, and the High Court has now increased the one year's imprisonment to ten years' penal servitude and the one day's imprisonment to seven years' penal servitude! The wantonness and gravity of the crime seem to have fully warranted these substantial additions to the punishment, and the case is a decidedly interesting illustration of the value of a system of criminal appeal for the revision of unduly lenient as well as of unduly severe sentences.

I was walking by a post-box when I remembered that I had a letter to post, so I slipped it through the slit. Just then the postman came up to clear the pillar. When he opened it I remarked that there were no letters in it, and I called his attention to the fact that I had just posted one. After poking sticks through the slit, a shower of letters fell down below, something inside the pillar having been out of order. The postman said that he would report this at once, but it struck me that the fact may account for the delay that sometimes takes place in the delivery of a letter.

Mr. Henniker Heaton raised a question in the House the other day as to the need for increased postal facilities at railway stations. A friend of mine recently brought me a genuine grievance which comes under this head. He made a hurried journey to Waterloo Station in order to post a letter by the late box on the night mail, but found it impossible to obtain in the station the necessary additional halfpenny stamp, and, consequently, had his journey for nothing. He would have had a similar difficulty, I believe, at other termini. It seems absurd to give people an opportunity of mailing late letters at railway stations without also providing an opportunity of purchasing stamps, and the deficiency could easily be supplied. There can certainly be no reason why stamps should not be sold in the Post Office vans on mail trains.

Yet another growl comes from Aldeburgh-on-Sea in reference to the water supply. The quality of the water has been more or less unsatisfactory for three years past, and latterly it has gone from bad to worse, until now it is described as so foul and evil-smelling as to be positively undrinkable. This explains the refusal of the authorities to publish the analysis which was made some time ago, and at the same time it renders their failure to adopt any effectual remedial measures all the more amazing and reprehensible. The present condition of the water imperils the health of the inhabitants and bodes ill for the prospects of the town during the summer season, but both the Corporation and the Water Company remain fast asleep, and the local public are apparently too polite, or themselves too lethargic, to disturb the slumberers.

In connection with the coal strike in South Wales, I have received information from Blaenavon of a most high-handed proceeding on the part of a local colliery company. A number of colliers occupy houses belonging to the company, and when these men stopped work, in accordance with the notices they had given, a month's rent in advance was deducted from the wages due to them. Possibly it is hoped in this way to help to starve the men into submission, and the course adopted is certainly a pretty commentary on the appeal which persons prominently connected with the company have made for the establishment of a relief fund. It is hardly necessary to point out, however, that such a confiscation of the wages the men had earned was a gross and impudent illegality. The company had no right whatever to deduct rent in advance, and the men should at once take action for the recovery of the money.

During an appeal the other day against a poor-rate assessment in the Prescot Union it came out that the valuers employed by the Union were paid 15s. per cent. upon the rateable value as fixed by the Assessment Committee. In the case in question the committee, in accordance with the report of the valuers, assessed the annual value of certain glass works at £5,047; but the appeal ended in the reduction of this amount to £2,721. I should have thought myself that the method of remunerating the valuers was, on the face of it, manifestly undesirable, but if there has been any doubt on the point, the outcome of this appeal should surely remove it.

Apropos of the criticism of the Hastings Harbour scheme in last week's TRUTH, I have received from Hastings a melancholy account of the condition of the harbour works, so far as they have yet been carried. The writer describes the masonry as having been undermined by the sea, through the defective character of the foundations, and as being full of cracks and gaps. He estimates that £200,000 would not make a satisfactory job of it, although upwards of £41,000 has already been spent, and the original cost was estimated at £204,000. What the cost will be, however, is a secondary consideration. The primary fact for the Hastings people to consider is that if the harbour were completed, it could never possibly earn a dividend on its capital, nor render any indirect advantage to the town the prospect of which might warrant the ratepayers in coming to the rescue of the company.

A Parliamentary return is now in course of preparation of the officials in the Four Courts, Dublin, drawing duplicate pay. It might be very usefully supplemented by a return of those drawing "personal salaries," and the manner in which such officials are at present employed. A "personal salary," I understand, is one which does not pass to the next official who succeeds the present occupant of the berth. There are a number of such officials in connection with the Four Courts; but, for reasons best known to the big-wigs of the Irish legal profession, they have recently been in several conspicuous cases passed over for promotion, and outsiders have been preferred before them. The taxpayer has a right to know why the services of such officials are not utilised in preference to those of outsiders; or, if they are considered unfit for promotion, why they are not retired, in order that the economies which have been more than once suggested by Parliament may be carried out. The Irish law offices and judicature appear to be a hot-bed of jobbery, and I wonder that the Irish members do not agitate for a complete reorganisation.

Rather a nice point was raised by a prosecution at Kingstown last week against the holder of a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors for consumption off the premises. It was proved that a man left the premises with a half-gallon can of liquor, and that he proceeded to drink the liquor as soon as he got into the road. On these facts the Magistrate convicted the defendant and fined her £2. In any such case the off-licence holder is undoubtedly responsible if the liquor is drunk not only on his premises but on any highway adjoining or near such premises, provided it is so drunk with his "privity or consent." The defendant on this occasion affirmed that she did not know the man was going to consume the liquor immediately outside her shop; and it would be interesting to hear by what process of reasoning the magistrate came to the conclusion that she did know. Unless the natives of the district are an exceptionally thirsty race, the fact that the liquor was fetched in a half-gallon can would surely suggest that it was to be taken away for consumption. To simply assume that there was "privity or consent," as seems to have been done at Kingstown, is to place an off-licence holder at the mercy of every impatient customer who takes a pull at a jug of beer on the way home.

At Romsey there is a public house kept by a man of the name of King, which belongs to Messrs. Strong & Co., brewers. King took into his service a woman of bad character, named Fanny Tubb. When King applied for his licence, the fact of this woman Tubb being on the premises was brought to the knowledge of the Licensing Magistrates by the Superintendent of the Romsey police, when the licence was granted on the assurance, both by King and by the representative of Messrs. Strong, that the woman was not to remain on the premises. A sergeant of the police subsequently found the woman on the premises at 11.25 p.m. The Superintendent, therefore, summoned the woman for being on licensed premises during prohibited hours, and the summons was dismissed. On the Bench were the brewer and the manager of Messrs. Strong & Co., and they took an active part in the dismissal. On this the Chief Constable of Hants applied to the Attorney-General to bring a Crown action against these two Justices for the penalties that they had incurred, having first obtained Counsel's opinion that they had rendered themselves liable to them. This the Attorney General has refused to do. It seems desirable that he should be called upon to explain the refusal, as he has been notified by the Chief Constable of Hants that it is necessary in the public interest, and as a matter of law the action can only be brought by the Crown. Most persons will agree with the Chief Constable that the action of the two Justices deserves not only public reprobation, but punishment.

A very questionable step was taken by certain J.P.s at Grantown-on-Spey the other day, when two Licensing Courts were held for the neighbouring districts of Inverness-shire and Elginshire. The Inverness-shire Court was summoned for noon and the Elginshire Court for 12.30. Some of the magistrates are qualified for both counties, and the business of the first Court having been disposed of in about ten minutes, these gentlemen insisted upon going on at once with the business of the second Court. This was also concluded before 12.30, and consequently magistrates and others who only attended at the time fixed for the Elginshire Court found that the Court was over. Whether this haste was due to mere excess of zeal or to some less creditable motive, I should think that the proceedings would, if challenged, be held to be invalid. There would be an opening for all sorts of sharp and undesirable practices if Justices were permitted to rush through licensing business in this unceremonious way before the hour appointed for the sitting of the Court.

Bryant & May is a limited liability company, concerned with the making of matches, and, I believe, it pays its shareholders a large dividend. An inquest took place last Saturday upon the body of a youth employed by the company as a dipper. The facts elicited were startling. Phossy-jaw is a disease produced by the handling of phosphorus. But if red instead of yellow phosphorus is used, the disease very rarely occurs. The Company, it is stated in the evidence without any contradiction, used some yellow phosphorus. The youth, Cornelius Lean, who died, complained to his mother of a swollen face. His sister was sent to the works to obtain a medical order. This was first given, then torn up, and the sister came back with the information that the youth must get out of bed and go to the office. He did so, when the manager saw him, and later on the factory medical man called to see him and attended to the case. On the death of the youth, this factory medical officer returned the cause of death as cellulitis, and, had it not been for the Registrar, who seems to have had his suspicions that it was due to phosphorous necrosis, the case would never have come before the coroner. Dr. Oliver, who made an autopsy, swore that death was due to exhaustion following blood poisoning set up by necrosis of the jaw, and the factory medical officer admitted that he now agreed with him. The coroner remarked that what he did not like about the case was the apparent desire to hush up the whole thing.

Apart from this desire, it seems evident that Bryant & May do use a mixture of phosphorus which produces phossy-jaw, the injurious results of which to their dippers are admitted. Some action on the part of the authorities should at once be taken to stop this. The mother of the youth said that she had wished to have another doctor, but was afraid to, as she understood that her son's sick pay would be stopped if she did. She had been told this by her daughter and others who worked at the factory. The representatives of the Company declared this idea to be unfounded. They would, therefore, do well to disabuse their employees of the idea, for clearly it prevails widely and is acted upon.

This is not the first time that Bryant & May have shown that an eye should be kept on them. Some years ago I called attention to the wages that they pay, and to their refusal to join other firms in the East End in putting them up. They employed—and, I presume, still employ—a number of women in making match-boxes. The price, I think, was 2½d. the gross. Out of this the worker had to pay for paste and string, and to keep up a large fire in the living room to dry them. An exceptionally good worker could make—provided that she had children to help her—about twelve shillings a week by working fourteen hours per diem, but the ordinary amount that could be gained by a fair day's work was about one shilling. I have no reason to believe that the lot of these women has been bettered. Bryant & May advertise on their boxes and on hoardings that they ought to be supported because their goods are made in England. I hardly think they are to be thanked for giving Englishwomen work at such a wage. But, as a matter of fact, they have a large factory in Sweden, where a considerable portion of their wares are made.

Last week a small boy was haled before Mr. Plowden at Marylebone Police-court on a charge of sleeping out, and having no visible means of subsistence. As it transpired that the little fellow had the sum of three farthings in his possession the magistrate at once discharged him. "Where money is found on a person, even if it is only three farthings, that is evidence," said Mr. Plowden, "of visible means of subsistence, and the charge fails." This is true enough if the charge happens to be heard by a magistrate who not only knows the law, but administers it with a due regard to the dictates of common sense and humanity. Unfortunately the vast majority of these charges come before country Shallows, who are apparently destitute of these qualifications. Persons accused of this so-called crime are punished, not only without mercy, but not infrequently without reference to the condition as to the absence of "visible means of subsistence."

On another charge under the Vagrancy Act, a London Stipendiary last week gave a decision which stands out in startling contrast to the constant practice of the Great Unpaid. Dealing with a case of begging, Mr. Cluer remarked that "for a person to ask for and receive a penny was not an offence. It only became an offence when that person begged habitually, with the deliberate object of living by begging." The Andover Borough Justices are evidently of an entirely different opinion. The other day they heard a case in which a man was charged with placing himself in a position to beg, the fact being that he had touched his hat to a local solicitor and said something to him with the object, it was presumed, of obtaining alms. The solicitor himself was not called to prove what took place, and the police testified that the prisoner was in regular employment. But the latter fact seems to have been brought forward only as an aggravation of the offence, and the magistrates convicted the man and imposed a fine, warning him that the next time he would be sent to prison. Judging from these two contradictory interpretations of it, the law for the repression of mendicancy must be amazingly ambiguous.

A sentence of two months' hard labour which was passed upon a young fellow named Smith, at King's Heath, last week, calls for the attention of the Home Secretary. Needless to say, it was not for a gross assault that Smith received this punishment. The offence charged against him was that he maliciously damaged a tree planted in a public road, and it is in the nature of Justices' justice to deal more severely with an outrage on a tree than with an outrage on a man or woman or child. I trust an effort will be made to obtain a reduction of a sentence which was rendered the more monstrous by the fact that the prisoner had never previously been in trouble.

Among the Justices who took part in the St. Andrew's District Licensing Court a few days ago were two solicitors who practise in the Fifeshire Courts. Both were very much down upon the Board of Inland Revenue for having, as they asserted, over-ridden an Act of Parliament. In turn these learned gentlemen are now themselves accused of over-riding an Act of Parliament by acting as Justices, a statute passed in 1825 being said to disqualify any solicitor from so acting in any county in Scotland. There are obvious objections to solicitors in practice sitting as Justices in licensing or any other courts, and if they are legally disqualified, it should be somebody's duty to see that the law on the matter is obeyed.

My Legal Pillory this week contains two more noteworthy examples—one from Derby and the other from Barnsley—of the friendly indulgence with which the old offender is regarded so long as his law-breaking is confined to mere outbursts of brutal violence. One might almost suppose, indeed, that in cases of this kind it is an advantage rather than otherwise to have a record of previous convictions, for the fines inflicted for the assaults at Derby and at Barnsley would have been extremely lenient even if the defendants had been making their first appearance in Court. When the magistrates come to deal with a charge of vagrancy or a trampery theft, it is quite another story. Then the law is enforced with Draconic rigour, and the culprit goes to gaol for a certainty when he is an old hand, and not infrequently when he is a new one. The only other feature of the following list to which I need call attention is the inclusion of three cases in which men were convicted of starving dumb animals. More merciful to the defendants than the defendants were to their beasts, the magistrates in each case permitted these animal-torturers to escape with totally inadequate pecuniary penalties:—

Derby Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor and other magistrates. Henry Harrison, convicted of assaulting his brother, Walter Harrison. Defendant struck his brother violently in the face, and subsequently knocked him down and kicked him in the mouth as he lay on the ground. There were seven previous convictions. Fined 10s. and costs.

Belper Petty Sessions. Before Mr. J. H. Woolley and other magistrates. Francis Gargaro, John Henry Smith, and Frederick George Castor, charged with cruelty, by leaving three horses in a field without proper food. The animals would have starved to death had it not been for the kindness of people living in the locality. Fined £1 each and costs.

Barnsley West Riding Police-court. Before Messrs. H. Pigott, M. Stanhope, W. Ewart, J. Brownhill, and Colonel Neville. Thomas Allan, miner, charged with assaulting a lad named Randle. The lad, who worked in the mine, was brutally knocked about by the defendant, who was described as an old offender. Fined 20s. and costs.

Isle of Ely Police-court, Wisbech. Before Mr. H. Sharpe, and other Justices. George Wm. Ingram, charged with starving a mare and gelding. The animals were described as in a shocking condition. Fined £1 and costs.

Redditch Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. E. W. Haywood, E. S. Cope, W. H. Yeomans, and T. Haines. George Newman, charged with assaulting Edward Shakspeare, an old man. Defendant struck the complainant a heavy blow on the temple, knocking him down, breaking his nose, and rendering him insensible. The Bench characterised it as a most unprovoked and cowardly assault. Fined £1 and 18s. costs.

Derby Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. W. Hill and J. A. Arnold. Wm. Sadler, charged with wandering abroad and lodging in the open air. Seven days.

Kirkcudbright Sheriff Court. Before Mr. Dudgeon. Mary Smith, charged with stealing an apronful of meal. Three weeks.

Oundle Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. H. Capron C. Winter, and W. Lenton. Walter Gamble, charged with trespassing in search of conies. Fined £2 6s.

Somerton Police-court. Geo. Webb pleaded guilty to stealing a turkey's egg. Fined £1s. 8s.

Wolverhampton Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. J. Lees, W. H. Jones, and S. Craddock. George Baugh, convicted of stealing two fowls. Two months.

Devonport Police-court. Charles Prout, charged with vagrancy by sleeping in an outbuilding. Ten days.

Beccles Police-court. Before Messrs. E. T. Dowson, R. G. Freeland, and J. E. Crisp. David Beckett, charged under the Poaching Prevention Act with being found in possession of a hare. Fined £1 17s.

Eckington Petty Sessions. Before Mr. J. F. Swallow, Major L. B. Bowdon, and Mr. Cockayne. Thomas Hill, charged with stealing a pair of goloshes. One month.

Exeter Police-court. Before Mr. Mark Farrant. Wm. Atkins, charged with sleeping in an outhouse, and being without visible means of subsistence. Committed for two days.

Brierley Hill Police-court. Before Mr. N. C. A. Neville. John Richardson, charged with assaulting Elizabeth Warr. He struck her a blow which felled her, and also struck her other blows, besides scarring her face with a knife. Fined £1 and costs.

Old Hill Police-court. John Capewell, convicted of assaulting his mother, a woman sixty-four years of age and blind. He struck her in the face and knocked her down, inflicting serious injuries. Fined £2 12s.

Paisley Police-court. Before Bailie Robertson. Alexander Malcolm, charged with stealing a linen handkerchief. Ten days.

Oswestry County Police-court. Before Mr. Rowland G. Venables. Thomas Cooper, charged with sleeping out. Ten days.

Carlisle Police-Court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. G. A. Main and N. Palmer. Fred. Rubmann and Wm. Jaeger, charged with cruelty to a pig by failing to supply it with food and water from April 4 to April 9. The Mayor said the Bench considered it a very gross case. There had been frequent warnings to the defendants respecting the pig, but they persisted in starving the animal. Fined £1 1s. each and costs.

No. I respectfully decline to pillory the Cheltenham Bench on account of certain recent convictions of parents for neglecting their children. The cases in question seem to have evoked considerable discussion, and I have had two or three letters protesting against the punishment inflicted upon the defendants. The writers are gentlemen who, though they doubtless enjoy the advantages of cleanliness in their own homes, cannot see that filthiness is a hardship to the children of the poor. In these prosecutions by the N.S.P.C.C. the little ones, some of them mere babies, were found in a shockingly dirty and verminous state, and living and sleeping amid the most loathsome surroundings; but, apparently because they were not starved or beaten, the critics of the magistrates consider that the summonses should have been dismissed. In my humble opinion, however, wilful neglect of this kind—and the prosecution has to prove that it has caused "unnecessary suffering and injury to health"—is fully as criminal as cruelty by actual violence, and often far worse for the child. If it be unfortunately true, as is alleged, that Cheltenham possesses plenty more parents as bad as those lately fined, the N.S.P.C.C. will do a humane work by at once bringing them to book.

The abduction of a child seems to be a venial offence in the eyes of Sheriff Spens of Glasgow. Last week he had to deal with a woman for stealing a girl three years of age, from the custody of her parents, who were kept for two years in absolute ignorance of the little one's whereabouts. The Sheriff pointed out that this was a very cruel thing for the parents, but he thought there was little real intention of criminality on the part of the accused, and she was let off with a sentence of thirty days' imprisonment. If the woman had taken away the baby's clothes and left the baby, no doubt as to her criminality would have arisen, and the punishment would probably have been twice as heavy, for, in the eyes of all orthodox administrators of the law, any trumpery bit of property is, of course, far more sacred than any mere human being.

It may interest Scotland Yard to know that our old friend the Spanish prisoner is, or was within the last few weeks, to be found in London. Letters have actually been written from London to residents in Warsaw telling the old story of the buried treasure, which is for this occasion described as hidden in the neighbourhood of that city, and requesting that replies may be sent to one Geronimo Peylaio, at No. 10, Melton-street. Full particulars of the letters appeared in the Warsaw Journal (an official publication) of April 24. The only Melton-street which I can find in London is in the neighbourhood of the Euston-road. At No. 10 in that street is a baker's shop, which was until a few weeks back in the occupation of one Herman Philipowitz. Philipowitz departed recently, leaving some amount of rent unpaid, and his landlord is now in possession. The landlord knows nothing of Geronimo Peylaio, nor have any letters in that name been received at the premises. It is also only fair to state that the landlord gives the departed Herman Philipowitz a good character, except in regard to his ability to discharge his financial obligations. Beyond this I am not able to carry the matter, but it seems to me that, with these facts before him, an intelligent police functionary ought to be able to discover Señor Geronimo, and to convert the Spanish prisoner into an English one.

A gentleman writing from the West of England describes how his gardener recently fell a victim to the "free ear-drum" swindle. The old man had seen the advertisement of J. H. Nicholson, or Nicholson's Aural Institute, describing how a charitable lady has given £1,000 in order to extend the benefits of the Institute to the necessitous poor; and he had solemnly accepted this as a piece of authentic news and swallowed the bait. No doubt hundreds of more or less illiterate people do the same. It is no credit to the Press that so many newspapers should still continue to publish this advertisement. The trick was fully exposed in TRUTH early in 1897, and, even if proprietors of country journals plead that they do not read TRUTH, they must know very well that the money bequeathed by the charitable lady cannot possibly have lasted all this time, after having been advertised in half the journals of the United Kingdom for a year and a half.

Nicholson is now carrying on his business from 17, Bury-street, Bloomsbury. By way, presumably, of keeping up the idea that he is an independent medical practitioner, he sends out to those who apply for the free ear-drums a prescription which the recipient is directed to send to "Richardson Brothers, manufacturing chemists, 9, Great Russell-street, London, W.C." The name of Richardson Brothers appears on the first floor of this address, but, as will be seen presently, there is every reason to suppose that the name is simply another alias of the gang running the "free ear-drum" and other tricks. Attached to Nicholson's prescription is a notice that, "Should the fund given by the lady not be exhausted at the time you reply to this, you will receive the ear-drums free of charge, if not, money will be returned." As already mentioned in TRUTH, the ear-drums are sent "free of charge" to every simpleton who forwards 13s. 6d. for making up the prescription, and 6d. for postage of the parcel; and as long as these sums of money are forthcoming there is, of course, not the slightest prospect of the charitable lady's fund being exhausted.

It has already been mentioned in TRUTH that a paper called Golden Sovereigns was being run from the same office as Nicholson's free ear-drum trick. The chief features of this publication are bogus competitions of the usual character, and advertisements of various quack remedies, hair restorers, and similar goods sold by Richardson Brothers, 9, Great Russell-street. There has also made its appearance lately a publication called The Woman's World, issued from Imperial Buildings, Ludgate-circus, which is freely adorned with the advertisements of Richardson Brothers, Nicholson's ear-drums, and of various goods, including "a watch free" (to examine), sold at Golden Sovereigns Office, 20, St. Bride-street. It also offers for competition a picture puzzle which has already done duty in Golden Sovereigns, It is obvious, therefore, that the Woman's World and Golden Sovereigns are run by the same gang; and a pretty gang they must be.

One of the features in the Woman's World, which has only been in existence a couple of months, was "a grand £5,000 ornithological contest," £5,000 being apparently the amount which the proprietors were prepared to give in prizes. The prizes were offered to those who could make the largest number of names of birds out of a number of letters which were given, prizes ranging from £100 downwards being offered to any one who could send in a list of twenty-five names of birds, and the only condition of entry being that the competitor was to subscribe to the Woman's World for one year. A lady in the country tells me that her daughter, after very hard work, actually sent in a list of 300 names of birds, together with her 4s. 4d. subscription to the paper. The paper came for two weeks, and then stopped. On writing to know the reason, she was informed that the prize list would be sent to her on April 19, together with the paper, but neither of them has made its appearance. This is precisely the Golden Sovereigns trick over again, as may be seen by reference to TRUTH of the 21st ult.

It is always entertaining to see a money-lender overreach himself, and that is what W. Nevill (otherwise Furnival), of 31, Cockspur-street, appears to have done in a case tried last week in the Queen's Bench. A young man named Hedger, who is entitled to a reversion after four lives of £20,000, applied to the Reversionary Purchase and Mortgage Agency for a loan. What connection there is between the Agency and Nevill was not explained, but it transpired that it was through his application to the former that Hedger was introduced to the latter, who agreed to lend him £150 for fourteen days at 10 per cent. Hedger says he signed a mortgage or charge for £150 upon his reversionary interest in favour of Nevill, but that the latter, after making out a cheque for the full amount, finally put him off with an immediate advance of £10 and a letter undertaking that the balance should be handed over four days later. Before the four days elapsed, an actuary's valuation was obtained, showing that as a security the reversionary interest was worth less, and Nevill thereupon refused to complete his bargain.

In these very curious circumstances Hedger sued Nevill for the balance of the loan of £150. The defence was that the whole arrangement was conditional upon the valuation proving satisfactory, and in the witness-box Nevill positively denied that he had ever obtained from Hedger any charge or mortgage upon his reversionary interest as security for the £150. On the other hand, the plaintiff swore that he executed such a deed at Nevill's office, and this was corroborated by his wife, who was present at the time. The jury accepted this evidence, and gave a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount claimed. Nevill is consequently compelled to make an advance of £150, for which, according to his own story, he possesses no security whatever. Moreover, if he really does possess such security as the jury believed, and it should hereafter become of value, he will still be unable to act upon it without running the risk of an indictment for perjury, for he has sworn that he never took it. Nobody is likely to feel any sympathy for Mr. Nevill in the truly Shylockian dilemma in which he finds himself. At the same time the story of this transaction, though he has got the worst of it, should serve to show that he is a dangerous man to have any dealings with.

A new light in the world of usury has arisen at Brighton. His office is at 23, Albert-road, and he adopts the alias of Jackson, his real name being Manham. It was only in August last that Manham started in this line of business, but, young practitioner though he is, he has already shown that he is up to some of the shadiest tricks of the trade. At Worthing County Court last week he was plaintiff in an action against two ladies named Skinner for the recovery of the sum of £61, and for detinue. These ladies were caught by Manham's advertisement offering loans at "reasonable interest." He made them three advances, amounting altogether to £36. 8s., and the "reasonable interest" was 100 per cent. per annum, with a proviso for "default interest" which worked out to 1,200 per cent. Manham also got from the defendants a document providing for the sale to him, for £25, of cattle worth £100, unless the animals were "redeemed" within three months. In connection with this transaction, he swore that he paid one of the defendants the further sum of £25 in gold, and this was corroborated by his brother, Lionel Manham.

The defence was that the signatures of the ladies to what was practically a bill of sale were obtained by trickery and misrepresentations. Both defendants stated that they signed the paper without reading it, the defendant telling them that it was "simply a security," and keeping his hand over the contents. Both also denied that anything was ever said about the sale of the cattle, and the lady to whom the £25 was said to have been handed swore that she never received the money. The gravity of this direct conflict of evidence was indicated by a remark of the plaintiff's counsel upon the improbability of the plaintiff and his brother "so deliberately acting as to render themselves liable to criminal proceedings for perjury and conspiracy." Nevertheless, the Deputy-Judge said he was quite satisfied that the £25 for the cattle never was paid, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff only for the exact amount he had admittedly advanced and without costs. His Honour expressed the opinion that when Manham took the document respecting the cattle he did not intend to make an "unrighteous use" of it; but that at a later period "he had seen his way to make an attempt to say that he paid this sum of £25 in gold." Whatever his original intention may have been, Manham not only attempted to say, but said on oath, that he paid the money to Miss Skinner; and in view of the Judge's finding, I shall be curious to hear whether there are any further proceedings of the kind contemplated by the plaintiff's counsel. It is assuredly a case which ought not to terminate in the County Court.

Here is a sample of a money-lender's letter somewhat less obsequiously polite than the usual run of such communications. The gentleman to whom it was addressed had received a touting circular from "Jackson" (whose real name is Abrahams), and had written in reply to refer Jackson to TRUTH of October 28, which seems to have aroused Jackson's wrath. Scratch a money-lender, and this is what you find:—

doubt follow. I am daily expecting to see one of the more adventurous, advertising himself or herself as "under the patronage of the police," so openly and recklessly is this defiance of the law carried on in the neighbourhood of Bond-street. Justice, indeed, seems to have slipped the bandage off her own eyes to blindfold Sir Edward Bradford with it, and now that the arrant jade can see, she makes up for her lenience to "the Professor" by extra severity to the unfortunate gipsy.

With reference to the trade of Batoum, a gentleman with special knowledge of the commerce of that part of the world points out to me that the trade to the port is principally mineral oil from Baku, that is to say, an entirely new trade which has sprung up during the last few years, and which is practically monopolised by British tank steamers. The British ships take the oil from Batoum to all the principal Mediterranean ports, and also to Bombay, Calcutta, and Singapore. My correspondent estimates that the gross earnings of shipowners in 806,000 registered tons (the maximum amount as yet credited to British shipping in one year) would be considerably over a million sterling. Such is the result to us of the passing of one port from Turkish into Russian hands. Yet against this transfer our Jingoes fought with tooth and nail, and they have scarcely ceased to deplore it down to the present day.

It has been stated in some of the newspapers that a dinner given by Sir James Kitson last week, at which Lord Rosebery was a guest, was a political manifestation in favour of his resuming the Leadership of the Liberal Party. What may have been the intention of Sir James Kitson, I, of course, do not know, but judging by the manner in which the list of guests was paraded in the newspapers, it looks as though some such object may have been at the bottom of the festivity. But this intention —if it existed—was not confided to the guests, who consisted in the main, like Sir James himself, of Liberals who have blossomed into "Sirs," and a few representatives of Liberal officialdom. It was generally supposed that it was a social gathering of titled Liberals to mutually congratulate each other on having attained the object of their ambition, and to show their gratitude to officialdom for having enabled them to achieve it.

I have not heard of late any discussion about the Leadership of the Liberal Party. Sir William Harcourt is the Leader, and no one seems inclined to question the fact. Were the Party to be successful at the next General Election, the Queen would send for Sir William to form a Cabinet, unless she were to depart from the Constitutional principles which have actuated her during her reign. Practically the Sovereign does not select the Premier. If a Peer is the Leader of the Party that has the majority, she, of course, sends for him. If there be no such Peer, she sends for the Leader of the House of Commons, because he is the de facto Leader of the Party. Were it not so, the Party Leader would be made by the Queen, and this would open the door to all sorts of Court and wirepulling intrigues.

To do Lord Rosebery justice, I do not think that he can be charged with intriguing to become our Leader, although I always doubt the sincerity of his resignation. I suspect that Cincinnatus, when he betook himself to his rural retreat, had an eye to being asked to return to office. He probably did not plough every day, but kept a look out for a deputation on the way to his farm, and when he heard that one was coming, had out his plough, and took care to be found ploughing.

As I have said, the situation of the Leader of the Liberal Party does not happen to be vacant. When it is, it will be time enough to consider who shall occupy it. The programme is, in truth, far more important than who is to be entrusted with carrying it out. Amongst those in the running for the succession there is no man who has any large personal following in the country, as was the case with Mr. Gladstone. What Radicals will have to insist on, whenever a vacancy does occur, is that no man shall lead them who will not pledge himself to a stalwart Radical programme. Otherwise it will be the old story—they will be jockeyed by the Whigs.

The Government Front Bench was watched with much curiosity by the Opposition during the China debate of last week. For a considerable time Mr. Chamberlain made notes, then he went away, but on his return continued to make notes. Mr. Balfour was sitting between him and Mr. Goschen, who also, like Mr. Chamberlain, seemed by his attitude to intend to speak. Eventually Mr. Balfour got up to close the debate. Whether he wanted one or other of his colleagues to speak, and they objected to doing so, or whether they wanted to speak, and he objected, no one could make out.

The allegation of bad faith on the part of Russia made by the Jingo critics of the Anglo-Russian negotiations leads me to suppose, either that they never read the published despatches, or that, having read them, their antipathies outrun their intelligence. The allegation is based upon the discussions as to whether Port Arthur was to be a commercial port, as well as a naval base. Now, what are the facts? On March 16 Sir N. O'Conor writes that Count Muravieff authorised him to inform her Majesty's Government that if China granted a lease of Port Arthur and Ta-lien-wan, "foreign trade shall have free access to both, similarly to the trade in other ports in the Chinese Empire." On March 21 Sir N. O'Conor informs Lord Salisbury, that Count Muravieff explains, that his words applied to Ta-lien-wan, and that he had never given any assurances that Port Arthur would also be open to trade. "I said," observes Sir N. O'Conor, "I would not deny this." On March 27, Sir N. O'Conor reports that Count Muravieff had given him the assurance that both Port Arthur and Ta-lien-wan would be open to foreign trade like other Chinese ports. On April 1, Lord Salisbury informs Sir N. O'Conor that Port Arthur is "useless for commercial purposes," and two days later he further writes that it "has no importance or significance except as a military stronghold," and four days still later he—or rather Mr. Balfour—writes that "Port Arthur is not a commercial harbour," and it is doubtful whether it could be converted into one.

Now, let any one look closely at these facts, remembering that Sir N. O'Conor raised the question of Port Arthur being a commercial port without any instructions from Lord Salisbury. After stating that Count Muravieff had assured him that it would be a commercial port, he admits that he misunderstood him. As, however, Count Muravieff supposed that the British Ambassador, in asking for it to be one, was acting on instructions from his Government, the Count says that it shall be a commercial port. On this, Lord Salisbury and Mr. Balfour both reply that it is useless as one, and that it is not, and cannot be made one. Thus they decline the offer, which Count Muravieff naturally does not repeat. As a matter of fact, if Ta-lien-wan and Port Arthur are to be included in one great naval station, it cannot signify to us one jot whether there be a custom-house at both, or a custom-house at one alone.

THE FIGHT AT TERRAFIRM SCHOOL.

There were good boys and bad boys, boys big and boys small,
Boys of all sorts and sizes at Terrafirm Hall.
For this ancient academy, world-wide in fame,
A most varied collection of scholars could claim.
From the north and the south, from the east, from the west,
For a place in its classes boys eagerly press'd,
Resolved to get on and impatient of rule,
Just like men in the world were these urchins at school.

There was rough English John, fairly high in the lists,
And exceedingly handy at doubling his fists;
There was Nicky, inclined over-grown to become,
And "Froggie" his fag—though he called him his chum;
There was Wilhelm, a bumptious young spitfire at best,
Who alternately toadied and bullied the rest;
There was Francis, good-tempered and loath to annoy,
And Abdul—a regular Turk of a boy.

There was also Umberto, with nothing to spend,
And entirely unable himself to defend;
There was Georgie the Greek, a poor, weak little chap,
The victim of bullies, the child of mishap;
There was Jonathan, too, second cousin of John;
And Pedro, nicknamed by his comrades "The Don:"
These, with others, whose names we may later recall,
For supremacy struggled at Terrafirm Hall.

Now, since boys will be boys, 'twill at once be inferred,
That "ructions" at Terrafirm often occurred.
The bullies, be sure, a good chance never miss'd
Of giving the arm of a junior a twist;
Notwithstanding the monitors' caution and care,
There was often a scuffle, a scamper, and scare,
Some bad case of "fagging," some cowardly assault,
And 'twas Abdul who was, as a rule, most at fault.

In vain did the monitors coax and coerce,
From bad, Master Abdul proceeded to worse.
When caught in the act first he whined, next he lied,
Then again, shortly after, his censors defied;
He twisted, he wriggled, feigned penitent tears
And his monitors set, all the time, by the ears;
Then, whilst they disputed what fate his should be,
He laughed in their faces and got off scot free.

And this isn't all: what he did, sad to tell,
Affected the monitors' conduct as well;
Instead of combining to bullies prevent
They themselves upon bullying soon were intent
Instead of protecting the boys who were weak
They themselves for a victim proceeded to seek,
And, profuse in excuses distressingly thin,
With a sort of wild glee went for feeble Ah Sin.

Poor feeble Ah Sin, not too bright, though no fool,
Was in the last form of the Terrafirm School;
Though hopelessly backward, and openly mocked,
He still had a play-box, both large and well-stocked;
And when, one fine day, Wilhelm stole up behind
And twisted his pigtail in manner unkind,
He was only too glad, with a timorous squall,
To buy off that bully—so gave him his ball.

Next day up came Nicky, and, crying out "Stop!"
Seized the neck of Ah Sin, and demanded his top;
Whilst "Froggie" (quite safe whilst big Nicky was nigh)
Stood on tiptoe, and blew several peas in his eye;
And even rough John, who at first had cried "Shame!"
Soon altered his tone and took part in the game;
The conduct of Nicky, he vowed, wasn't right,
All the same he would trouble Ah Sin for his kite.

But worse still remains: whilst the monitors made
On defenceless Ah Sin their most cowardly raid,
The Lower-School boys, left unwatched and unchecked,
Behaved in the way one might fairly expect.
They also adopted a bullying tone,
And arranged for a fight, very soon, of their own—
A fight between Jonathan, cousin of John,
And Pedro, nicknamed, as we've mentioned, "The Don."

A pretext to find was a labour quite slight,
When Jonathan once had determined to fight;
For "The Don" more than once, with a merciless grin,
Had been caught sticking cockchafers through with a pin;
He'd been seen to hunt cats, he'd been known to devise
Ingenious tortures for innocent flies;
So Jonathan, glad of a reason so pat,
Declared he would fight Master Pedro for that.

So the battle began; and already "The Don"
Has been hit in the wind, though he's still fighting on;
Whilst Jonathan, always of brag far too fond,
Now threatens young Pedro to duck in the pond.
So the battle goes on—whilst the monitors still Make no effort at all to their duties fulfil;
So the battle goes on—midst a horrible din,
Whilst the monitors still are defrauding Ah Sin.

Meanwhile, need we say, that this purposeless brawl
Is producing mere chaos at Terrafirm Hall?
The class-rooms are empty, professors are "guyed,"
Books and discipline equally thrown on one side;
The progress the pupils were making is stopped,
And even the semblance of study is dropped;
Whilst out in the play-ground, from morning to night,
The boys are discussing the next likely fight.

Is it too much to ask, then, that some kind of rule
May be soon re-established in Terrafirm School?
Is it too much to ask that the fight may be stayed,
Which tends that Academy's tone to degrade?
'Tis the monitors' fault 'twas allowed to commence
On so very transparent and weak a pretence;
And surely all sensible men will agree
That the sooner they stop it the better 'twill be.

SCRUTATOR.

LORD SALISBURY AND SOMEONE ELSE.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY and Lord Salisbury are both level-headed men. The former found himself obliged to yield to the war fever of his countrymen; the latter has successfully resisted that of some of his countrymen. That Lord Salisbury's negotiations with Russia are open to criticism is obvious. But that he effected all that we could reasonably hope for is equally obvious. Russia is rapidly civilising Siberia. Her Government may not, according to our ideas, be a good one. But it is far better than that of China, and we shall commercially be gainers, notwithstanding the Russian protective tariff, by her replacing China in Manchuria. She has secured a commercial port and a naval base on the Pacific. This is right and proper. Under similar circumstances we should have insisted on them. Our interest in China, as Lord Salisbury said, is commercial rather than territorial. We want to be able to trade with China on the same terms as all other Powers. This right Lord Salisbury has maintained. The area of Free Trade in China has not been reduced by one mile. In the debate of last Friday, Lord Charles Beresford and Sir Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett were the exponents of Jingoism. What the latter wanted I do not know, but so far as I could gather, it was to drive the Russians out of Asia, a task which seemed to me likely to be a difficult one, even if that doughty knight headed our forces. Lord Charles wished us to establish ourselves in the central provinces of China, kindly to undertake to look after the finances of these provinces, and to organise an army of Chinese under British officers to defend them against the world in arms. We were not otherwise to interfere with Chinese rule, and thus we should have made ourselves responsible for all its iniquities. Of course, our Chinese Army would have had—as is the case with the Indian Army—to be stiffened by British regiments. We should thus have had a Chino-British Empire, peopled by one or two hundred million Chinese, added to our responsibilities. Unlike our Indian Empire, it would not have had a natural frontier. France, Germany, and Russia would have at once divided up the rest of China. Our system is free trade, theirs is protection. German goods and those of all other countries would have had access into our share of the spoil; our goods would have been excluded from theirs. Apart, therefore, from the cost and risk of this modest grab, we should have actually lost commercially by it.

The Jingoes who did not go quite so far as Lord Charles complained that Lord Salisbury had not assumed a firm tone with Russia. As far as I could understand them, they were under the impression that, had he taken this tone, something would have been gained as against Russia; but what that something was, and whether it was worth gaining, not one of them explained. Assuming, however, that this something was worth the getting, I see no reason to suppose that we should have obtained it by this "firm tone." The Emperor of Russia is not a potentate like the Emperor of Sokoto, or the King of Uganda. He is the head of the greatest military Empire in the world. It may, therefore, reasonably be supposed that he also would have assumed a "firm tone," with the result that there would have been war between the two firm-toned countries, in which case, be the result what it might have been, the Chinese Empire, that we are desirous to keep on its legs, would have been split up into fragments. My complaint against Lord Salisbury is that he had nagged at Russia unnecessarily. But I hold that, taking a large view of all the occurrences connected with the recent Chinese "question," his action deserves commendation rather than blame. His colleagues were roaming about the country making inconsiderate and compromising speeches. His followers in Parliament were every day examining and cross-examining his representative in the House of Commons, with a view to force him to tread the Jingo path of damnation. The Conservative Press was every day suggesting that he ought to be replaced as Foreign Secretary by someone else. Indeed, so persistent was this Press campaign, that it looks to me as though the "someone else" by whom he was to be replaced was at the bottom of it. That the Premier managed to secure for us all that we really needed, and that he did not plunge us into war, are services that, whether we are Tories or Radicals, ought, in my humble judgment, to be recognised.

A nation afflicted with the Jingo craze is like a person given to drink, who, if he cannot get brandy, falls back on some other intoxicant. As the Chinese "question" is closed, at least for the moment, we shall, I anticipate, soon have a Boussa "question," and as we have been prevented from going to war with Russia on account of Port Arthur, we shall be called upon to go to war with France on account of Boussa. This interesting village has never, probably, been visited by more than twenty Europeans. It is situated in the centre of Africa, and to get to it a fever-stricken zone of some 300 miles must be traversed. We and France both claim it, each alleging a prior treaty with some negro, who asserts that he may bestow it on whom he pleases. A less desirable possession for a European country the mind of man cannot well conceive. Unfortunately, however, Boussa, if ours, comes within the area of Mr.

Chamberlain's dominions. He has been blustering and swaggering for a considerable time about what he will do, if not allowed to include it in these dominions, and he has managed to get together a negro force officered by Englishmen in its neighbourhood. Fortunately Lord Salisbury has returned to England, and I trust that he will keep a wary eye on Mr. Chamberlain's doings. A Commission has been sitting in Paris to decide to whom Boussa and the adjacent country really belongs. It is composed of French and English, and they differ. If they cannot agree, then let the question, in the name of common sense, be referred to the President of the Swiss Confederation, or some such independent arbitrator. One essential is that there should be a clear line of frontier between our sphere of influence in the interior of Western Africa and that of France; and provided that this line be traced, it matters very little whether the line be a few miles one way or the other. That two civilised nations like France and England should go to war to decide to which of them a few square miles in Central Africa belongs would be a crime. Apart from the harm that would be done elsewhere, the war in Africa would be a horrible one. Each country would enlist savages, and, having armed them, turn them loose on the other. Once armed, it would be impossible to prevent atrocities of the most hideous character taking place on both sides. This seems hardly the way to introduce civilisation and Christianity into Central Africa. I used to hear a good deal about the Nonconformist conscience. It was moved to its innermost depths by the episode of Mr. Parnell and Mrs. O'Shea. It has slept fast ever since. Is it not time that it should wake up? Those, too, who are not Nonconformist used to have something that they were pleased to call a conscience. Have they come to the conclusion that its promptings ought to be ignored? Surely even those who deem that a certain number of negroes ought periodically to be sacrificed on the Jingo altar, should feel that—what with Matabele and Ugandese—we have of late offered up a sufficiently heavy sacrifice to gratify the Jingo divinity, and that it is not absolutely necessary for us and France to go to war about a wretched negro village, in order that more negroes may be killed. I really do not know to whom Boussa belongs. The only thing that seems certain is that it does not—as one would naturally have supposed—belong to its inhabitants. I do not care one brass farthing whether its destiny is to belong to us or to France. What I do care is, that we and France do not go to war over this paltry bone of contention—a war into which we may be pushed by Mr. Chamberlain for his own ends, unless Lord Salisbury is well on his guard. This is why I think that the moment is ill-timed for Radicals to attack Lord Salisbury on account of his foreign policy.

When I first went into Parliament—some thirty years ago—I was a follower of Mr. Bright. Often I followed him into the lobby with half a dozen others against Tories and Liberal officialdom on matters concerning our Foreign relations. He became a Minister.. But no sooner did he hear of the bombardment of Alexandria, than he shook the official dust from his feet. When I have any doubt now how I ought to vote on armaments and on "firm attitudes" towards Foreign Powers, I ask myself how Mr. Bright would have voted, and as he would have voted, so do I.

OUR COUSINS ON THE WAR PATH.

The President of the United States is, we are told by the Times Correspondent in America, surprised to hear that British opinion is veering towards Spain, and that it is a question whether the majority in Parliament is not now Spanish in sympathy. Can this, he asks, be true? There is a certain amount of truth in the report that has reached the President. The attitude of the majority of Members of Parliament, so far as I can gather it, is somewhat as follows. They had no sympathy with Spain in her Cuban misrule, and they were shocked at the cruel mode in which the civil war in that island was carried on by General Weyler. Their sympathies were entirely with President McKinley in his endeavours to end the war, and to secure to Cuba an autonomous government. Nor do they blame him for not, as head of the Executive, having put himself in antagonism to Congress. But they consider that the resources of diplomacy had not been exhausted, when Congress insisted upon an ultimatum being sent to Spain which no self-respecting country, whatever its errors, would have accepted. This was all the more objectionable, as a Liberal Government, far more inclined to grant acceptable terms to Cuba, had succeeded the Government of Señor Canovas, and the Queen-Regent, being a foreigner, would have ruined the prospects of her son had she not met the ultimatum with a point-blank refusal. Members of the House of Commons do not question that the war is, in the minds of many inhabitants of America, waged on grounds of humanity, nor do they question the right—indeed, the duty—of America to interfere to secure good government to Cuba. But they are inclined to think that the ultimatum was rather a political move on the part of Silverite and Republican Senators against President McKinley, than the result of any real desire to settle matters in Cuba. Moreover, when there is a fight between a big and a little man, there is always a sort of sympathy for the little man, irrespective of merits and demerits. The war having commenced, and it being obvious that victory must ultimately rest with the United States, such M.P.'s hope that the latter will be speedily successful. Nor do they doubt that this result will be of advantage to Cuba, which will be better off if divorced from all connection with Spain.

In these views I in the main agree. I have always been the strongest advocate of a thoroughly good understanding between us and the United States, because I have never seen any reason why the two countries should not be the best of friends. But I am no great believer in the twaddle that is written about ties of blood, &c. Countries act from an enlightened view of their own interests, not from sentiment. This is wise, for sentiment is the most dangerous of guides If one country is at war with another, it always looks for aid from its racial cousin, but very seldom gets it. Cousins are left to paddle their own canoe. Just now the Americans are in a very cousinly mood, and some of our newspapers suggest that we should meet this disposition half-way, because, if we do, and if we ourselves subsequently get into any difficulty, the United States will help us to get out of it from a sense of cousinly gratitude. Thus we ought to be speculatively affectionate. All this is outside the area of practical politics. When two men, or two countries, are fighting, the result depends upon hard blows, and not upon the sympathy felt for one or other of the combatants by a looker-on. In this Cuban quarrel we are—as a nation—neutral. Being neutral, we are bound to fulfil the international obligations involved in neutrality fairly. We have a right to express the hope that the outcome will be that the Cubans are freed from their connection with Spain, or that, if the connection be maintained, it will be a merely nominal one. But the expression of this hope is of no material aid to the United States, and it is not based upon cousinship. Our newspaper gentlemen on both sides of the Atlantic are too much inclined to imagine that their articles are potent in all things. The pen, they say, is mightier than the sword. Mightier it may be, but it is not stronger when swords are drawn. For my part, if England were seriously attacked, I would rather have an additional ironclad than the warmest and most sympathetic of newspaper articles. I fully recognise that President McKinley is most anxious—irrespective of this war—to live on terms of cordial friendship with us. I entirely reciprocate this aspiration. And it is because I do, that I would have our friendship based upon something more practical than cousinly cant. Only a very little while ago, we and our "cousins" were at each other, hammer and tongs, respecting the ownership of some worthless and pestiferous forest in Venezuela. Our cousinship was as much forgotten, as was the fraternal tie that united Cain and Abel when Cain cut the bond by killing Abel. I like America, I like the Americans, and I like their Government. But in these feelings, I am not actuated by the fact that they and I read Shakespeare, or that we ask for mutton or beef in the same language.

Apart from the merits or demerits of the war in which they are now engaged, I regret to be obliged to recognise that the Jingo microbe, whose insidious attacks are so harmful in Europe, has crossed the ocean, and is playing havoc with the sound, practical common sense that used to be an American characteristic. Americans welcome war as though it were a national blessing. If the accounts that come over to us are correct, the entire nation is engaged in drilling, volunteering, and ghost-dancing after the manner of Red Indians. War may sometimes be a dire necessity, but where the pleasure comes in I do not see. Soldiers may like it, for it is their profession. But what enjoyment can a decent civilian find in arraying himself in a coloured coat, girding a knife to his side, carrying a gun over his shoulder, and betaking himself to an island, where, if not shot, he will probably die of the yellow fever? Nor can it be pleasurable to pay the bill. Unless the Americans are far less intelligent than I take them to be, their war craze will be a brief one, and they will soon regret that they did not leave President McKinley to work out Cuban salvation from misgovernment without recourse to arms. War is like matrimony—enter upon it in haste, repent at leisure.

LEIGH SAMPSON ANNOUNCES HIS DEATH.

It will surprise no one to hear that Leigh Sampson is dead at last. It will be remembered that when last heard of he was lying seriously ill at Boulogne, in the character of "Henry Travers." From that town his wife wrote giving a sad account of his sufferings from brain fever, and soliciting the purchase of one of his pictures to relieve his deplorable condition. The tender-hearted recipient of the letter sent the English Chaplain at Boulogne to relieve the distressed couple, and on his arrival the Chaplain found Travers, alias Sampson, walking about in the best of health, and so robust that he gratuitously insulted the cleric almost as soon as he saw him. There can be no doubt that the letter of the supposed wife was really in Sampson's own handwriting, and it is also quite certain that Sampson's wife was not with him at Boulogne, as he has been separated from that lady for some years.

The publication in TRUTH of the story about the brain fever and the Chaplain's visit caused Sampson's feelings to get the better of him, and he proceeded to indite certain post-cards, which led to his expulsion from Boulogne by the police. He seems to have gone on to Brussels, where fresh misfortunes overtook him—not brain fever this time, but phthisis, induced by privation. At last he died. The melancholy particulars may be learned from the following curious letter addressed to a gentleman in the suburbs of London. The date of Sampson's demise is not stated in so many words, but as the letter is dated April 22, the expression "three weeks ago" fixes it on the First of April—a most appropriate occasion:—

Consultations
de midi à 2 heures.

35, Rue de la Tourelle, 35,
Etterbeek, Bruxelles, La Belgique,
April 22, 1898.

MONSIEUR,—I must apologise for this writing to you, the more so because I do not have the pleasure to know you, but I do so on the behalf of the young widow and child of a Scottish painter, a Monsieur Donald Sampson, of whose work, I understand, Monsieur, you have been a patron.

This young Scotsman came to this town some time ago, and because I speak English he has consulted me concerning his health.

I have found upon examination that he was much injured by phthisis, and this was originated by privation of long standing.

I prescribed for him, but quite without effect, and he died here three weeks ago.

He was interred by charity, which is now exhausted, and left his widow quite penniless. She is a young lady of the highest character.

She has made me aware of your name, sir, and has said that if I will write to you declaring the facts, it will be thus possible that you shall consent to aid this unfortunate person by purchasing the last and only picture her husband has left behind him.

The purchase will enable the two (the widow and child) to make a return to Scotland, and as the widow does not speak French it is the better she should return to her own land, where she may possibly obtain proper employment.

The picture I will venture to send with this letter for you to approve of.

The price is £10 sterling (or francs 250) and it is called "Anvers, La Belgique."

I can assure you I am sorry to intrude upon a gentleman whom I do not know, but, all the same, the circumstances compel some one to help this young Scottish widow and her child, so that upon her appeal to me to write to you I could not refuse.

Receive, sir, the assurance of my highest consideration,

CHARLES VAN BUREN.

Let me at once beg the reader to dry any tears which may have been evoked by this melancholy story. There is, happily, not the slightest room for doubt that it is Leigh Sampson himself who thus chronicles his own decease. The rascal is not much of a hand at disguising his penmanship. In the character of "Charles Van Buren" he makes a feeble attempt to adopt a foreign hand at the beginning of the letter, but the disguise drops off before he has written many lines, and Leigh Sampson stands plainly revealed. Those, however, who are not as familiar as I am with Sampson's handwriting, may easily be imposed upon by the letter, for the rascal has actually got the heading, including the delightful touch, "consultations de midi à 2 heures," printed. Either this means that Sampson is living in the house of a Belgian physician whose notepaper he has purloined, or it means that he has gone to the expense of having this heading printed for the express purpose of this novel fraud. In the latter event, it may be assumed that more people than one have been favoured with a similar letter, and with replicas of "the last and only picture he has left behind him." I trust that none of them has risen to the bait.

I would respectfully suggest to the authorities at Scotland Yard that they should call the attention of the Brussels police to No. 35, Rue de la Tourelle, and Monsieur Charles Van Buren, or whatever the name may be under which Sampson is at present masquerading. As soon as the Belgian police know that he has been turned out of France, and that he has only come to Brussels for the purpose of embarking in a purely criminal undertaking, he will probably be compelled to move on and die again somewhere else. Seeing that he has, by his own account, been born in at least a dozen different places, it would be only in accordance with the fitness of things that he should die and be buried in an equal number. Anyhow, he is a thorough-paced swindler, and it is quite clear that he has now cast aside all scruples and will stick at no fraud for the purpose of obtaining money. Under these circumstances the best thing that can happen is that he should be hunted out of the Continent and driven back here, where our own police can now very soon make a case against him.

A JUDGE ON AREA-GATE TOUTS.

I am now in a position to throw a good deal of useful light on the firm of "Hibbins & Co., Manufacturers, Publishers, and Importers," of 4, Eton-street, Richmond, a characteristic letter from whom was published in TRUTH of the 21st ult. In the first place it turns out that No. 4, Eton-street, is the address of my old friends, E. Pike & Sons, who achieved notoriety in the area-gate-touting business two or three years back. Moreover, it also appears that the same business is carried on from the same address in the names of "J. Barker & Co." and "Clark & Co.," the latter of whom have also come under notice in TRUTH, and from the perfect similarity of their style of business, I take it there can be very little doubt that Pike, Hibbins, Barker, and Clark are all aliases of the same individual or gang.

In their character of Clark & Co., this gang got a well-deserved dressing at Wandsworth County-court on the 25th ult. One of their representatives had endeavoured to sell a book on farriery to a gentleman's groom at Blackheath, and failing to get an order from the man, he had resorted to the common trick of leaving the book for the man to look at, and afterwards insisting that he had ordered it, upon which Clark & Co. forwarded their thanks for the order, together with an instalment payment card. The man's master, on being consulted, sent the book back to Clark & Co. by registered post, repudiating any order, and Clark & Co. then commenced proceedings against the man in Wandsworth County-court, claiming the sum of £1, notwithstanding that £2 5s. was the price at which they had invoiced the book to the customer. It may be that the reduced amount of the claim was due to Clark & Co.'s consciousness that they had no chance of recovering the nominal sale price of the book; or it may be that they thought thus to tempt the man into some offer by way of compromise. At any rate the case came on for trial, and the groom was defended by counsel; but no plaintiff appeared. An application being then made for a special order for costs, it transpired that some ten other cases of a similar character, in which Clark & Co. were plaintiffs, were down for hearing before the Registrar, where, strange to relate, a representative of Clark & Co. was in attendance—I suppose for the purpose of going through the simple form of obtaining judgment by default against defendants who had not appeared. Judge Lushington had the whole of these cases brought into his court, and thus got Clark & Co.'s representative before him. In eight out of the ten cases the Judge held, in the absence of the defendants, that the production of orders purporting to be signed by the defendant was not sufficient, and struck the cases out. In the course of these proceedings the order purporting to be signed by the groom was produced by Clark & Co.'s representative, and on the groom denying his signature and supplying the Judge with his authentic autograph, his Honour at once pronounced the signature to be a forgery. In giving judgment, the Judge delivered some scathing remarks upon the character of Clark & Co.'s business, which he said constantly tended to promote dishonesty, and which, in the case before him, had led to forgery, while in another case, where the defendant appeared, it had led to perjury.

In this estimate of the area-gate touting business the Judge was probably under, rather than over, the mark. This class of trade is carried on by systematic roguery on the part of the agents, who employ every kind of trick and misrepresentation in order to get orders, and (as has been repeatedly shown) have no scruples about forging a servant's signature when all other means fail. On the other hand, where the girls have been gammoned or bluffed into giving an order, they find themselves saddled for months with a liability which will swallow up the greater part of their wages, and if they are too honest to repudiate the contract, or too timid to apply to their employers for advice or help, they go on paying over their hard-earned money to their victimisers for shoddy goods which they probably do not want, and which are always sold to them at three or four times their market value. After denouncing this "vile business" last week, Judge Lushington cynically remarked that it would probably be resumed the next day. No doubt it will, but there is no reason whatever why it should not be stopped. All that is necessary for that purpose is to compel all the "travellers" and "agents" engaged in the business to take out hawker's licences, and to make such licences voidable on the first proof of dishonesty or sharp practice on the part either of the holder or his employer.

PASTOR JONES UNDER THE HARROW.

There are some interesting disclosures in the report of a firm of accountants at Chester upon the cadging operations which have been carried on in connection with the Bridge-street Baptist Mission in that city. The Mission is run by Pastor W. S. Jones, a pious humbug whose doings have been noticed in TRUTH on several occasions. Mr. Jones formerly traded as a wholesale stationer in Chester, and acted as pastor of a local Baptist Church. In his character of pastor he earned some notoriety by reason of his widely-distributed appeals for subscriptions. A couple of years or so ago he became a bankrupt with large liabilities and small assets, and about the same time differences with the officers and congregation led to his withdrawal from the Baptist Church. In his public examination at the Bankruptcy Court a good deal of time was devoted to an attempt to elucidate the debtor's dealings with the finances of the chapel and an institution associated with it, but he shuffled and prevaricated to such an extent that the Registrar ultimately closed the proceedings without, he said, getting "anything satisfactory" out of him. Jones still remains an undischarged bankrupt. Nothing daunted, however, by censures from the Court or cold-shouldering from his old flock, this undischarged bankrupt at once created a new sphere for his spiritual and social labours. He started the Bridge-street Mission in a building rented at a few shillings a week, and solicited support by means of unctuously-worded circulars from people in all parts of the country. The attention his efforts received in TRUTH, and later on in the Chester Chronicle, led him a month or two back to submit the accounts of the Mission to a well-known local firm of accountants, Messrs. Edwards, Son, and Warmsley. It is their report which has now been published, and if Pastor Jones expected an auditorial blessing of his enterprise, such as his namesake John James Jones was fortunate enough to obtain from his auditors, then he has been most grievously disappointed. The report is an unequivocal condemnation of the methods to which Jones has resorted for procuring funds.

It is clear from the auditors' report that the so-called treasurer of the Mission was a mere ornamental figure-head so far as the receipt of subscriptions from the outside public was concerned. His name appeared on the circulars, but it was to "E. H. Jones," the wife of the pastor, that money had to be sent, and the pastor himself "has exercised absolute control over the financial affairs of the Mission." The printer's bills show that 9,000 circulars have been supplied. Jones states that only 1,300 have been sent out, but the auditors remark that they have "no means of verifying the figure." According to the books kept by Jones, which the auditors have accepted as substantially correct, the sum of £188 0s. 7d. has been received in answer to these circulars. Of this sum no less than £120 has been swallowed up by postal and printing expenses, so that the cost of collection has been over 13s. in the £. Its wastefulness, however, is the least objectionable feature of Pastor Jones's system of raising money for the Mission. He has habitually distributed circulars "so worded as to imply that funds were urgently required to wipe off heavy deficits which, in fact, did not exist." One circular stated that certain expenditure on the mission building had exceeded the estimate by £30. It appears from the report that this was untrue. Last June there was a special appeal "to clear off the balance of £150." At that time the indebtedness of the Mission was only £50. In January last help was besought "to clear off the balance of our expenses (of over £300) during the next fourteen days." The deficit was then only £25. The report of the auditors proves, in short, that the needs and position of the Mission were described in these circulars in terms which were grossly misleading, if not deliberately mendacious. It concludes with the observation that "there is nothing in the circumstances of the Mission calling for the continued issue of circulars of appeal to the general public." Whether Pastor W. S. Jones will have the impudence to resume his appeals after the auditors scathing exposure remains to be seen.

I have referred to this case principally because it is a typical one. There are many similarly self-constituted religious and philanthropic prophets, who, being more or less without honour in their own neighbourhood, prey upon the benevolence of people at a distance. Some do the trick by means of touting circulars; others prefer the aid of salaried collectors. The public are greatly to blame, of course, for responding to such importunities without any inquiry as to the nature and necessities of the concern or the character of the parties handling the cash. Those who administer the law are, however, also to blame for their lack of vigilance and stringency in dealing with this form of mendicancy. Many of these appeals emanate from purely local institutions, which, even if they are honestly conducted, ought not to be allowed to cadge all over the country for support. But though the police might have a difficulty in cases of that kind, they could, at any rate, take action for the protection of the public and the punishment of the offender when it is known that cash is being solicited by circulars or canvassers upon the strength of gross misrepresentations either as to the nature and extent of the work or the financial position of the undertaking. The law is enforced often enough against poor wretches who ask a passer-by for a copper or a crust of bread. It can surely cope as effectively with the more sturdy beggars who obtain money by false religious or charitable pretences.

CANVASSING THE GREAT UNPAID.

Certain startling statements as to the canvassing of magistrates in licensing cases, which were lately made by District Inspector Ball before the Licensing Commission, have evoked a good deal of discussion in Ireland. A few J.P.s, conscious perhaps of their own virtue, have denounced the witness's evidence as a foul and baseless libel upon the honour and integrity of the Bench. In other quarters he is held to have understated rather than exaggerated the facts of a serious scandal. It is affirmed that the practice of canvassing magistrates is far more common than the general public have hitherto supposed, and that it is not by any means restricted to licensing matters. On this point the Kerry News makes some remarkable allegations as to the prevalence of the system in the Tralee district, and quotes the testimony of a local magistrate to the effect that, on the morning of a Court day, his place of business is besieged with litigants eager to give him accounts of their cases in advance. At Tralee it has been noted that magistrates frequently attend the Court only to hear one particular case, and to check this a plan has been adopted for indicating in the reports the entrances and exits of each member of the Bench.

There may be differences of opinion respecting the extent of this evil; but in the face of the facts that leak out from time to time, it is simply idle to deny that magistrates ever allow themselves to be canvassed, or ever come to Court with minds biassed by an ex parte version of the case they have to decide. Only a week or two back I described an instructive incident at Kilmainham Quarter Sessions, where the marked zeal with which some of the magistrates were backing up an application for a licence aroused the misgivings of the Recorder. The applicant was interrogated by the Recorder as to whether he had canvassed any of the gentlemen on the Bench, and though he showed a strong inclination to fence with the question, he eventually admitted that he had spoken, first to "one or two," next to "not more than three," and then to "three or four" of them. It seemed probable that the number would be still further increased under the pressure of the Recorder's examination, but at that point the applicant's counsel prudently advised him to close his mouth, and the case was adjourned. Anybody who has watched the manner in which the Licensing Laws are administered must know that what happened on this occasion is what not infrequently happens in such cases. It is notorious, indeed, that when it is a question of granting or cancelling a licence, magistrates are whipped up by interested parties to support one side or the other.

Nor is it in Ireland alone that this is done. The same thing sometimes occurs here, and here, as in Ireland, the canvassing of magistrates is not always confined to licensing business. I do not for a moment suggest that it is done systematically, or that the majority of magistrates countenance it, and above all I do not wish to insinuate that there is anything in the nature of a sordid corruption of the sources of justice. To give Shallow his due, he is an honourable man, though deplorably wooden-headed. It stands to reason, however, that among a body selected as our amateur magistrates are, there must be many with an imperfect appreciation of the duties and responsibilities of a judicial office. This is nowhere shown more forcibly than in the travesties of justice which occur under the Game Laws. The ardent game preserver does not hesitate to adjudicate in a charge of poaching, though his prejudice almost inevitably sways his judgment. In the same way magistrates constantly act in other cases, to which, whatever their intention may be, they cannot bring the open mind which is required if impartial justice is to be meted out. The canvassing that goes on takes the form of a complainant, or defendant, or some intermediary, waiting upon a magistrate to beget his sympathy with a one-sided story of the rights and wrongs of the affair. If he knows his duty, the magistrate, of course, refuses to listen. But he does not always know his duty, and even if he is careful to make no promise, he goes to the Court with his mind influenced, though insensibly, by the statements he has already heard. To say this is to take the most charitable view of the result which must follow when a magistrate allows himself to be approached in this way, and discusses and considers beforehand a case which he has to judicially hear and determine. Occasionally the result is worse, and from time to time I have noticed in TRUTH instances in which it was manifest that the Bench had made up their minds before the evidence was given. I have had to notice, too, not a few cases in which magistrates have persisted in adjudicating upon matters in which they were more or less personally or pecuniarily interested, or in which they were known to be affected by ties of friendship or relationship to parties before the Court.

In proportion to the whole number of magistrates, those who are guilty of these irregularities and improprieties are doubtless an insignificant minority; but there are sufficient of them, and the scandals that arise are frequent enough to account in a great measure for the discredit and distrust in which Justices' justice is widely held. Such a state of things is practically unavoidable so long as men are placed on the Commission of the Peace on social or political grounds, regardless of their lack of training or qualifications for judicial work. It is, in fact, one of the penalties we pay for an honorary and amateur magistracy.

TWO BABY SHOWS.

"A babe in a house," says the late Mr. Tupper, "is a well-spring of pleasure." I begin to understand the popularity of the poet. He understood his public. There are two babes in the London playhouses at present, one at the Avenue and one at Terry's; and no words may exaggerate the pleasure of which they are the well-spring. The theme is the same in either case. A baby is left on the steps of a club or in the purlieus of a private house. Who are the parents? Suspicion falls on every one in any way connected with the place. Wives suspect their husbands, servants their master, fiancés and fiancées one another; suspicion is universal. The grounds of so much distrust are negative; it is only by incredible folly that any one is implicated. But the wise public roars.

The Avenue baby had two nights' start of Mr. Terry's. The Corkscrew Club was the scene of its adventure. The members were summoned to consider its career. Mr. Sidney Brough was a member, and proposed to join an even more famous club at Westminster. In other words, he was a candidate for Imperial Parliament, and practised his eloquence on his wife (Miss Vane Featherstone), her sister, her father (Mr. Lal Brough), and his friend (Mr. W. T. Lovell). By a series of accidents more improbable than even farce permits, Madame was led to suspect her Sidney. Her father arriving on the scene with two suits of dress clothes, what more natural than that she and her sister should follow him to the club, disguised as youths? Two ladies in trousers naturally offer a great opening for time-honoured jest; Mr. William O'Brien deprived of his natural covering was not a richer mine. Meanwhile, Mr. Lal is at the club before them. He, too, suspects his Sidney, and must attend the meeting in a false beard. Unhappy Lal! For certain reasons, the members take him for the baby's mother. Of what badinage, what persiflage is he the centre! The baby is raffled and falls to his share. He hurries home to a merciful dénouement. The baby's mother proves to be a mysterious advocate of Woman's Rights. She accepts her own, and the others cease from being suspect. Before that culmination the ladies have visited the club, and conversed with their respective husband and fiancé. One of them has been made to smoke a cigar, the other has fainted and dropped her garter; but they have not been recognised. The club scenes are unconsciously the most diverting. The regulations are amiable. You do not sit in your cab outside the Corkscrew till they make you a member, but another member gives you a sufficing card of admission. It seems "a shy place for a sucking member," as Mr. Wagg said of Fairoaks when he visited Pendennis's mamma. If I were Mr. Sidney Brough, I should not rashly bring my best constituents there of nights. The Corkscrews are genial, and address one another collectively as "Boys." They talk rather loudly and some of them wear very odd whiskers. The acting is vivacious. Mr. Brough and his son, Miss Susie Vaughan and Miss Featherstone, Miss Beatrice Ferrar, and Miss Alice Beet, whose excellent maid-servant deserves an especial good mark—to all these cheery persons may Messrs. Sterner and Knoblauch, the authors, well be thankful. But the baby remained mute among the members of the Corkscrew. Perhaps he shared my amazement upon one point: what could such a dear old gentleman as Mr. Robert Soutar be doing in that galère?

If they work hard in Northumberland-avenue, I can promise you they have to bestir them in the Strand. The weight of their improbabilities seems even heavier. The Terry baby came on Friday night. The Professor was in his laboratory. His wife—of secondes noces—and her mother were away; he was on the eve of vast discoveries. A lady drove up to the house. The Professor did not know her, but her features, handsome and prominent, resembled those of Miss Vera Beringer. She left the baby in the laboratory. The Professor might have rung and given the baby to a servant. But we should have had no farce. The Professor knew his business—which was to be mysterious. He retained the baby and let his shadow on the blind, with the babe in his arms, inform the household. When his wife and mother-in-law returned, the case against the Professor was of a nature to repay his efforts. Nor was this enough. He went about talking in such a manner that his maid-servant was alarmed. It was clear that he meant to vivisect the child. The maid-servant withdrew the babe, and the suspicion of the Professor's man-servant, her affianced, fell on her. The mother-in-law now entered the ring. She was engaged to one Captain Sandy, of the Merchant Service. A large, red Scotsman came upon the scene. He carried a bag marked "Sandy;" he answered, among his familiars, to that name. Plainly this was mamma-in-law's fiancé. The Professor greeted him as Captain Sandy. The real Sandy arrived. He was informed about the baby, and saw in it a pledge of his fiancée's treachery. More excursions, more alarums, more misunderstandings; Need I enumerate them? The first Sandy was the baby's grandfather. Another grand-parent was the Professor. The parents of the child were the Professor's son and the Scotsman's daughter, secretly married.

The whole thing is, of course, quite nebulous and foolish. Farce has its privileges, but Mr. Terry's babe exceeds them. Even farce must have some basis of the plausible, and "Shadows on the Blind" has none. There is a certain skill in the mechanism as in some clock-work toy; a certain sense of the theatre is evident in both these pieces. People come on and go off when they are wanted to. I confess I saw them go off with greater pleasure, and I am in no hurry to see the club baby or the professor's any more. Here again the skill and energy of the actors do much. Mr. Terry still is Mr. Terry, Mr. Hubert Willis has the authentic accent of the north, Miss Fanny Coleman adorns the mother-in-law, Mr. Guyton Heath is an effective servant. Authors, however, are warned that we have had enough of stage babies.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

PICTURES IN PARIS.

THE vernissage at the Salon was always a cohue. But it was a mob made up of all sorts, and the ladies did their utmost to be strikingly elegant. As there was a war of toilettes, these two jarring words are admissible, for true elegance should never in ordinary circumstances hit the eye. The authentic millionaire or billionaire, Duchesse, Marquise, Comtesse, or Baronne borrowed her weapons for the nonce from the emancipated demoiselle or actress, who laid herself out to triumph over the combination of aristocracy and wealth. Chic was the sovereign lord as represented by the Prince now Duc de Sagan. He made and unmade reputations in the monde où l'on s'amuse. To be distinguished by him for a few moments at a vernissage was to rise in that monde to the pinnacle of distinction, and to have at once a court of heavy-swell admirers in the Salon and at lunch at Ledoyen's. The mob has remained; but the monde élégant, except so far as it represents officialdom, has deserted it. Great actresses will go if their portraits are exhibited. But they affect only to attend in the forenoon, and then they slip off to lunch, not at the grand new buffet or the Eiffel Tower, but, as of old, at Ledoyen's. Of course, they do not return. The mob go to the buffet, which can lunch 1,000, and to the Tower.

M. Faure's private view has this year been more public than any such previous ceremony. He has quick perceptions. In the three days he spent at St. Petersburg he saw that the Czar did not isolate himself from his people. The public could approach him. This example was not thrown away on the President. The usual official gathering, including Premier, Ministers, Ambassadors, Generals, and so on, awaited him at the Machines Galleries, where the two Salons are now installed. He had begged that the special public which had come in the morning to write about the works of art should not be turned away. After his arrival he further requested that it should not be excluded from the rooms he was to pass through. The President came in a carriage with a General of Division. His wife and daughter were in another carriage, they having no Protocol rank.

When he got down they joined him, and he named the personage who was to give each lady his arm. Premier Méline, the incarnation of the lean kine, had the honour of conducting Mme. Félix Faure, a lady of dark complexion and fairly stout figure, who stands well on her dignity. She was in a dress and bonnet of the fashionable electric blue—a revival of a blue that was called, when I was a child, thunder and lightning. Mademoiselle was in white and pale lilac. The combination was not unpleasing. She, too, stands seriously on her dignity. And why should she not? The Foreign Minister was chosen to serve as her escort. M. Berge, the son-in-law, was not in the family party. He holds himself a good deal in reserve, a proof of discretion. M. Détaille had the honour of taking round Mme. Berge, the President's youngest daughter.

The two Salons are in temporary wooden structures roofed with an awning in the Machines Gallery. The halves of each are to right and left of a central garden. From a wholesome fear of fire the exits are numerous. The Salon exiled from the Champs Elysées is nearest to the chief entrance to the Machines Gallery; that driven from the Champ de Mars is at the upper end. A big restaurant divides the rival shows. The centre of the gallery is arranged as a garden and given over to sculpture. It also has an awning, so that the glass and girders overhead are hidden, and the sun's rays tempered. The corners are cut off all the rooms in both Salons—a great improvement.

The number of young painters is endless. The show is not the better for this. So few of them send good works. The work of works in the Champs Elysées Salon—as we still call it—is Détaille's military painting. It is, in a way, a nocturne in daylight. The subject is the Emperor and Empress of Russia going from the camp of Chalons to the railway station; time, an afternoon—say five in the evening—in October. The sky is stormy, but brightened towards the west by the sunset. The road is heavy and sloppy after the rain. It runs between two banks, one higher than the other. Cavalry, light and heavy, are massed on both, and behind them, as far as one can see. The Imperial carriage, turning a sharp curve, advances. It has its back to the setting sun, which gives strong relief to a group of cuirassiers on the highest roadside bank. It takes almost the value of a headland crowned with cavalry, with glinting helmets and cuirasses, but otherwise in shade, for they are in profile, and the sunset is on their far side. The foremost cuirassier salutes the party in the carriage, and M. Faure, who sits back to the horses, has taken off his hat. The painter has caught the expression of beaming happiness that he wears in Royal or Imperial company. The Czar is observant and silent, the Czarina haughtily indifferent. Détaille went to the Chalons review for his impressions. He painted in water colours the Imperial guests on the review ground for a New Year's gift-album for the Empress. I think in the painting now on view he has surpassed himself. Those night effects in the daytime have been carped at, but they only show how well he observed the effects of sunset towards the end of October. The sunset that followed the review was between two downpours of rain. The Imperial carriage is drawn by eight Artillery horses. Four untidy Artillerymen serve as postilions. The French Artillery has not the neat look of the English. Two Tartar servants of the Czar sit in the rumble. H.I.M. prefers Tartar to Russian servants. They are very honest and attentive to their duties, and do not drink. All the Tartars in the Imperial household are sons of the Prophet.

France is a Pandora. Somehow, Détaille's painting gives rise to dark forebodings. One wonders in gazing at it what fresh evils are going to take wings and fly out of Pandora's box. It does seem a picture of evil omen and a presage of a gathering of great forces to battle. Not that Détaille thought to prophesy in painting it. Not that he knows aught of Gog and Magog, unless as he saw them at the Guildhall. It never occurred to him to look for their representatives in the pseudo-democracy incarnate in M. Faure, and the gentil Autocrat of All the Russias

Benjamin Constant sends two portraits. One is of M. Sohège, of fencing celebrity, who stands with legs apart and arms folded, as if in an attitude of defiance. His cane might be a foil. The painter has lent him the Duc d'Aumale's leggings. Have you seen the portrait of the Duc d'Aumale, exhibited two years ago by Benjamin Constant? M. Sohège's short knickers (they only come to the knee) and jacket are dark drab. The portrait by the same artist, of M. Hanotaux, is one to study. M. Hanotaux is full-face, and stands leaning against the back of a chair, of which we see the top. He wears his lightly-set glasses, behind which the keen, bright eyes glint. The face is full and nearly square, and yet rather a clever than a strong face. The Foreign Minister does not come from a race of country lawyers for nothing. His sharpness is instinctive. He is (in the portrait) self-satisfied and happy, and will always be Vicar of Bray. The nose is too pinched and is straight, and not long. Neither is it very short. He appears to be making some explanation. M. Hanotaux has greatly smartened up in diplomacy. Still, Benjamin Constant detects an indescribable provincial something. This reminds me that the Foreign Minister speaks not only with a Picardy accent, but the accents of his native burg in Picardy. Flameng's portrait of a young lady in white satin and a much-frilled cape in white crêpe lisse, is deservedly admired. The model has beauty of a southern character, and a lovely figure, which her Princesse robe moulds at waist and hips like a glove. The frilled pelerine is thrown over one shoulder, and painted with virtuosity. It is a splendid fantasia in white.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

LORD SALISBURY, dear Lady Betty, is now known as "The Little Minister."

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A COLOSSAL JOKE.

(Through Reuter's Agency.)

WASHINGTON, April 14.

Senator Hoare, speaking in the Senate, said, "If this country is to do a great act of international justice, let us do it calmly and deliberately."

(From Our Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, April 21.

A state of war now exists between this country and Spain, but just how and when the first blow will be struck is, of course, merely conjectural.

THE BLOCKADE OF CUBA PROCLAIMED.

Times leader, April 23.—War has at last begun in deadly earnest, but as yet no shot has been fired. It is universally felt that there is a break in the history of the world.

BOMBARDMENT OF MATANZAS.

(By Anglo-American cables.)

April 27.

The bombardment of Matanzas, the first important hostile act of war, began half-an-hour ago, at five minutes past one in the afternoon. This is the first time one of our great warships has gone into action, and it has been interesting to note the perfect discipline which prevailed. The officers gave their orders in voices hardly raised above the pitch of every day.

KEY WEST, Later.

Rear-Admiral Sampson, in reply to a question as to whether he was satisfied with the result of the bombardment, said, "Yes, I am—I expected to be."

OFF HAVANA, April 28.

The engagement has had a good moral effect on the men. To-night they are contented. They have done something, if not very much, to revenge their comrades who perished on the Maine.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE BOMBARDMENT.

MADRID, April 29.

The American ships bombarded Matanzas. There were no losses amongst the Spanish troops, but one mule was killed.

* * * * *

Oh, that infidel mule! The spirit of Cervantes must assuredly have inspired the brain which evolved that monumental joke! America may blow the Spanish fleet into splinters; her soldiers may sweep the Spanish forces from the face of the earth, and the United States may exterminate the Spanish race; but it will take centuries to wipe out the memory of the Matanzas mule, a beast which is destined to live in history as one of the celebrated animals.

. . . . .

I have received the following letter:—

"SIR,—At great expense I have secured the remains of the now historical Matanzas mule. Will you be so good as to announce to the public that I propose shortly to exhibit this memorable beast in London, when I feel convinced that the entire population will visit the remains of an animal which must for ever rank as an equal with the Geese of the Capitol, Jonah's Whale, and Balaam's Ass?—Yours faithfully,

A SHOWMAN."

. . . . .

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—No, it would not be right to add the Battle of Matanzas to Creasy's "Decisive Battles of the World."

. . . .

A war between Great Britain and the United States could scarcely occur, for public feeling in this country would be so much opposed to such a conflict. On the other hand, a war against any combination of European Powers, with the English and the Americans fighting as allies, would rouse the enthusiasm of the nation to the utmost pitch. Nevertheless, there is throughout Great Britain a strong dislike of one section of the American public, a section which is not by any means the most numerous, but is, necessarily, the most noisy. That section is composed of adventurers and adventuresses, and has many representatives in politics, in society, and in the Press. The men who belong to it are unscrupulous, boastful, pushing, and unrefined; and the women possess the same feelings. This explains much of the unsympathetic attitude assumed in many quarters—especially in the West End—towards America at the present crisis. Great Britain is with the United States hand, heart, and soul, but the noisy, flashy section of Americans rubs the English the wrong way at every turn, and irritates them. There are millions of straightforward, noble-minded, and cultivated American men, and there are millions of gentle and refined American women, but it is not these, obviously, who push themselves to the front and attain notoriety. As for our liking Spain, the English like no foreign country; and that is why no foreign country likes Great Britain. But we admire the dignity and the chivalry of the Spaniards, just as we admire the industry and the indomitable courage of the Americans.

I met General Blanco, who is in command of the Spanish forces in Cuba, in the seventies. At the close of the Carlist war, two days after Don Carlos had fled over the border into France, together with the late Captain Barton of the Guards, the late Sir George Home, and the late Duc di San Lucar (whose original name was O'Shea), I accompanied an elderly Infanta on a visit to the troops commanded by General Blanco. The visit was the more interesting, as it was the first occasion that any member of the Royal House had entered Spain since the revolution. A regiment was drawn up to receive the Infanta, and it must be admitted that her arrival did not evoke the slightest sign of welcome. A moment later General Blanco, at the head of the cavalry, which had been engaged only the night before, was seen trotting down a zig-zag path through the hills; and a more picturesque scene I have never beheld: it was worthy of the Opera. General Blanco alighted at once on reaching our party, and apologised profusely for the somewhat dishevelled appearance of himself and his men, which was due to their having ridden practically straight from the battlefield. One of our party distinguished himself. Having scrutinised the General's horse carefully, without more ado Captain Barton leapt into the saddle, and putting the horse to the trot, and then to the gallop, tried its paces. This altogether unconventional and unexpected incident charmed the troops, who cheered him lustily, and General Blanco himself was delighted. The General, in answer to a question put by myself asking why Don Carlos had been permitted to escape, replied, "He would have been more inconvenient as a prisoner than he even was as a pretender." Indeed, every facility was carefully afforded him to escape.

The Exhibition of the Royal Academy this year (or any other) may be described as an exhibition of excellent mediocrity. There is very little that is especially good, and very little that is especially bad. On this occasion poppies and palettes abound, and the portraits are mostly those of Lord Mayors, Mayors, and company directors. The majority of pictures resemble oleographs more than they do paintings.

The following deserve attention:—

59. Lord Halsbury in an "encore."

63. Oh! my collar!

220. Miss Irene Blair. Excellent. Luke Fildes, R.A.

229. Moorland Quietude. Magnificent. Peter Graham, R.A.

266. A Phantom Procession.

305. Poppies and Potations.

314. The Silver Sea. Very good. B. W. Leader, R.A. Elect.

342. A Villainous Attack upon TRUTH.

403. The City Cherub.

418. Our Pea-green First Parents.

420. "The Grass-crowned Headland of a Rocky Shore." Excellent. Peter Graham, R.A.

552. The Matanzas Mule.

649. Mr. Pickering Pick Picking his own Pocket.

977. After the Battle. Admirable colouring. Sir Harry H. Johnston.

Believe me to be, very truly yours,
MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

FUTURE running will probably demonstrate that the Two Thousand horses were an exceedingly moderate lot, and that most of them are not stayers. Disraeli won cleverly enough at the finish, and I was always of the opinion that he would turn out to be the best of the Newmarket lot, but no competent judge believes this colt to be anything approaching to a first-class horse, and I quite expect that Dieudonné will defeat him at Epsom. One wiseacre announces that Disraeli is "almost certain" to win both Derby and Grand Prix, but the merest tyro in racing affairs knows that a victory in the Two Thousand, however easily gained, cannot be regarded as a satisfactory trial for the Paris race, the distance of that event being one mile and three quarters, over a very tiring course. I would be vastly surprised to hear of Disraeli ever staying the distance at Longchamps if there were a decent pace. Wantage would have been all the better for a few more gallops, but I fancy his trainer had to prepare him very tenderly while the ground was hard, for fear of his breaking down. His trial with Chancery was all moonshine, but the Duke of Portland (who was salmon-fishing in the Garry last week, in the depths of Inverness-shire) had so poor an opinion of the three-year-olds that he quite expected that Wantage would finish in the first three. I have never believed in Ninus, who started favourite. His trials, about which such a preposterous noise was raised, were all nonsense and rubbish, as I pointed out three weeks ago. Ninus can be made more fit than he was on Wednesday, but he has no chance for the Derby, as he manifestly lacks stamina. Prince Soltykoff's colt showed fine speed for three-quarters of a mile, and then he utterly collapsed. The infatuated backers of St. Evox deserved to lose their money, and the large sums for which he was supported for the Derby are gone, as he has been scratched, and very sensibly, for he obviously had not a 5,000 to 1 chance. When ridiculing the trial of Ninus, I also pointed out the fatuity and absurdity of the idea (then prevalent) that Brio (who was second favourite for some days) had been galloped in any sort of conclusive way. Mr. Baird's colt utterly failed to stay the course. I predicted that Batt would carry off the Two Thousand if he won his trial, and, as a matter of fact, he was not successful in the gallop at Kingsclere, so his defeat in the race did not surprise me. There was no excuse whatever for Batt, as he was perfectly fit and well, and the same may be said of Hawfinch, in whose prospects I never believed in the very least degree. Of the beaten lot in the Two Thousand, Wantage (if he can be trained), Wildfowler, and the colt by Bend Or out of Jenny Howlet, will probably do best in the future. I feel sure that the Malton colt will win a big race (very probably a handicap) in the course of the season, and he must on no account be lost sight of. Jeddah greatly disappointed his friends, and he ran a perfect wretch, but how any sane person could believe in this colt's ability to win the Two Thousand after his slovenly display in the Craven Stakes it is impossible to understand. Jeddah was undoubtedly backed by some people only because he had won a mile race in public, and was therefore sure at least to stay, but the pace was apparently too fast for this colt, as he was never fairly in the race.

The addleheads who had backed Heir Male for the Derby were grievously disconcerted by his hollow defeat in the Chippenham Stakes by Santhia, and he is not likely to run at Epsom. The real truth is that Heir Male cannot stay a yard beyond five furlongs.

Florio Rubattino wants time, as he was very backward, but he will never be above the handicap class, and the same may be said of M.D. and Schönberg. Wildfowler will do better in the future, and I fancy this colt will ultimately turn out to be a long way the best stayer of the lot.

I stated last week that Galtee More would not run at Newmarket, but would be reserved for Ascot, but some of the sporting papers persisted in "going for" Mr. Gubbins' horse for the March Stakes. The race was won, in accordance with my prediction, by Newhaven II., who made a perfect hack of Bridegroom II. It is a pity the Australian horse has been so egregiously messed about. He ought to have won the City and Suburban in a canter, and the Chester Cup would have been a certainty for him if he had been left in for that handicap. The running of Newhaven II. shows clearly enough that the Ascot Cup will be no certainty for Galtee More.

When writing last week about the One Thousand, I predicted that Nun Nicer would win, and that Alt Mark would get a place, and I may, therefore, congratulate myself on the result of the race. Nun Nicer won very easily, and if she goes on all right she ought certainly to secure the Oaks, as she appears to stay well, and she has nice speed. Royal Footstep will do better later on in the season. Airs and Graces, who astonished every one by finishing second, was bred by the Duke of Portland, who sold her as a yearling for 430 gs. She had been going remarkably well in her gallops, but nobody ever thought of her seriously in connection with this race. St. Ia, who started an equal favourite with Nun Nicer, entirely failed to stay the course, as I expected would be the case; and the extravagant absurdity of the romance, by which many fatheads were gulled, about the private superiority of Airosa to Disraeli was plainly demonstrated. Mr. W. Johnstone's filly was very heavily backed by the public, and so was Simylla, whose trial did not justify the expectation that she would win this race. Ayah is another filly that lacks stamina, and Ebba ran very badly; but, as I pointed out, her gallop with Mauchline told one nothing, and the trial filly had been beaten on the first day of the meeting. Of the defeated lot on Friday, I expect that Lowood will improve on this form, and she is very likely, indeed, to win the Coronation Stakes at Ascot for the Duke of Westminster, who paid one of his now rare visits to Newmarket last week.

Ravensdale again showed himself to be a woeful impostor by his ignominious show in the Ely Plate, Ugly giving him 36 lb. and literally walking away from him. It may be hoped that the last has been seen of this beast on the turf. He has cost backers a pretty penny since the season commenced.

I predicted last week that the Duke of Westminster will win the Dee Stakes at Chester to-morrow, and the race ought to be a good thing for Calveley.

Mr. Brassey may just as well scratch Orzil out of the Derby, and if he is wise he will enter this colt for the Fernhill Stakes at Ascot—a race which he would probably win, as he goes a terrific pace for about five furlongs, and then suddenly stops. Mr. Brassey has a grand two-year-old in Boniface, half-brother, by St. Simon, to Orzil, who, I hear, will make his début in the Woodcote Stakes at Epsom.

There are any number of tips for the Royal Plate at Kempton Park on Friday, but I know for a certainty that some of the animals mentioned for this event are nothing like fit as yet. Mr. Fairie's Galliot, by Galopin out of Agave, is said to have been specially prepared for this race, and to have been well tried. One of the papers mentions Dieudonné as having won last year's Royal Plate, which, as a matter of fact, was secured by Chon Kina, and the Duke of Devonshire's colt did not run his first race in public until five months afterwards, when he made a successful début in the Imperial Produce Stakes at the Kempton Park October meeting.

There has been practically no betting on the Jubilee Handicap, but there will be plenty of speculation on Saturday, and wise people will not meddle with this race until the numbers are up. Berzak, who has been specially reserved for this handicap, will be just suited by the course, and he is very well just now. It does not seem possible that the stable can make a mistake in any trial for a mile race when Diakka is known to be in form. Crestfallen is not yet at his best, and Dunlop will be an awkward horse for a boy to ride, while The Convict (who is a very smart colt) has quite enough weight to carry on Saturday. Eager will not run, and I do not fancy Minstrel. Alt Mark is well in, but the One Thousand form was probably very poor. Dinna Forget and General Peace will both be backed by clever people. For the winner I shall look to Bridegroom or Berzak.

Lord Rosebery's filly, Corposant, by Sheen out of Illuminata, dam of Ladas and Chelandry, is the "big letter" selection of several papers for the Royal Plate at Kempton Park, but she has been beaten in her trial. It is probable that she wants time. Lord Rosebery's Apennine, sister to Velasquez, is a beautiful racing-like filly, and she may possibly be seen out at the Epsom Meeting; but it is more likely that she will be reserved for the £5,000 stake at the Sandown Park July Meeting, as she is still backward.

Another much-talked-of two-year-old that palpably wants time is the Duke of Portland's Manners, own brother to Amiable; but he is a highly promising colt.

There will be racing next week at Newmarket, Ripon, Thirsk, Newton, and Gatwick. There ought to be some interesting sport at Newmarket, where the programme is principally made up of two-year-old races.

The Newmarket Stakes, which will be worth about £4,700, has 169 three-year-olds left in, but there are not likely to be more than about a dozen runners, including Disraeli (who is nominated by his breeder, Sir Tatton Sykes, who will receive £300 out of the stakes if the colt wins), Orzil, Elfin, Heir Male, Locarno, Jeddah, The Wyvern, Nun Nicer, Wantage, Cyllene, Ayah, Ninus, Schönberg, and either Batt, Ameer, or St. Maur, the Duke of Westminster having accepted with half a dozen. There are neither penalties nor allowances in this race, so that the Two Thousand horses will meet on precisely the same terms as in last Wednesday's race. Dieudonné has been left in for the Newmarket Stakes, but I understand that the Duke of Devonshire has quite decided to reserve his colt for the Derby. Hermiston is lame, and will not run, and Cyllene appears to be hopelessly out of form, and he can have no earthly chance of winning this race if his miserable exhibition during the Craven meeting signifies his true running. It was thought that Mr. Rose's colt had been chopped at the start in the race for the Column Stakes, but good judges who have since seen him at Newmarket are of the opinion that this excuse is all fiddle faddle, and that he is "all to pieces" just now. Wantage is capable of much improvement, and he ought to have come on considerably by Wednesday next now that rain has fallen. It will be good policy to get a race out of this colt as soon as possible, for his fore legs are desperately groggy, and he will have to be thrown up directly the ground gets hard. I am not sure that the extra distance will quite suit Disraeli, and shall expect the Newmarket Stakes to be won by either Wantage or Elfin. By the way, this race is not a costly event for the Newmarket fund; £2,000 is nominally added, but the owners who have subscribed contribute £1,822 towards this sum. The Burwell Stakes, on Tuesday, has a wretched lot of animals engaged, and The Reeve may be able to win, in spite of his bad running in the Hastings Plate last week. There are sixty-nine entries for the Payne Stakes, which was formerly the most important three-year-old race of this meeting. The entry includes Orzil, Dieudonné, Neish, St. Ia, Dunlop, Ninus, Schönberg, and Batt. A prediction on this event cannot reasonably be attempted until after the race for the Newmarket Stakes.

Sixty-eight two year-olds were originally entered for the Exning Plate of £500, and no fewer than forty have been left in. Lord Rosebery's Peterero is the best representative of public form, but one of the dark lot will probably win. The Somerville Stakes, which has forty-eight entries, may fall to Amurath, unless Sweet Marjorie, by Vandal out of St. Marguerite, makes her début in the race. There are nineteen acceptances for the Spring Stakes, but it is utterly impossible to deal with this race, the animals engaged being nearly all dark. The Prince of Wales' filly Eventail will probably win any race she starts for at this meeting, and she is entered in the Exning Plate and in the Dyke Plate. Fifty-four animals have accepted for the Bedford Plate of £800, which is the richest two-year-old event of the week. It is quite likely that the Kempton Park race on Friday will discover some smart animals. The entry for the Bedford Plate includes Sibola, an American-bred filly of Mr. Lorillard's, who has a great reputation at Newmarket. Sir B. Maple has four engaged, including Nun Royal, half-sister, by Royal Hampton, to Nun Nicer. The Breeders' Plate of £500 has no fewer than sixty-eight two-year-olds left in, and this event may be won by Mr. Gubbins' St. Valentine II., by St. Florian out of Aigill, if she goes for it. I hear she is a decidedly smart filly. Up to the present time the only two-year-old we have seen out that has any approach to good form is Amurath, and I do not believe he has any real pretensions to be regarded as a flyer.

The Lawn Tennis Club de Paris has certainly been doing its best to encourage and develop the game. M. Lecaron, the President, and MM. Spiers, Masson, and Fontaine have worked together to bring off a series of professional matches on the club's covered court. The Frenchmen are no less generous in the inducements that they offer to the paid player than they are in the hospitality that they show to English amateurs. For this competition, Fleming, of the Queen's Club, London, Kerr, of the Fitzwilliam, Dublin, and Burke, also an Irishman, of the Paris Club, competed. Burke and Kerr fought out the final. It was a splendid game, and the strategy of Burke in the end proved too much for his opponent. Kerr has had but little experience of covered-court play. He is nearly forty, but plays a tremendously hard and fast game. He is very strong and well developed, with extraordinarily large hands. He serves with terrific force, and his returns never lack pace. In the last set he had four games to one, and Burke crept up in a wonderful way and just won. He deserves every credit for his victory, for he played with his head all through, never losing himself for a moment and gradually out-manœuvred his opponent. Naturally, the Frenchmen were very enthusiastic over their own man's success. Indeed, during the game the linesmen at times were so keen that they gave their decisions and applauded. This naturally was rather disconcerting to the players, but the action was so well meant that no one could take offence. No doubt these gentlemen will endeavour on another occasion to cultivate the stolidity of an English linesman. These professional games were a sequel to the matches at Easter when both English and French players were competing. The latter have certainly come on since last year, and the best players amongst them were Aymée and Durand. The open singles went to G. M. Simond, and the doubles to R. B. Hough and Flavelle. The Englishmen thoroughly enjoyed their trip.

At last the football season is to all intents and purposes at an end. The chief feature in Association football has been the development of the professional game in the South. Already rumours are heard of the leading players in League teams coming down South. The popularity of the game now enables club promoters to offer players in the North and Midlands such terms that the League teams will have to put up their prices if they wish to retain the men's services. The League managers will soon regard the South with as little affection as the Scotch clubs regard the League. But the improvement in the game is not confined to the South. The play in the Association Cup-ties revealed the fact that in other parts of the country the hierarchy of the Football League was being seriously assailed. The clubs that compose this League no longer claim a monopoly of first-class players. The Football League and its managers have dominated the Association game for too long a period. The public has learnt that other teams can play a game not one atom inferior to that which the leaguers show. The consequence is that these clubs, finding they can get good gates, no longer hanker after admission to that select circle. Public interest is much better sustained when opponents in the neighbourhood are met than when the visiting teams come from the other end of the kingdom. Just as the professional game has developed, so also have the numbers of amateur clubs of all sorts and conditions increased. No doubt many of these clubs will act as feeders for professional clubs, even if they do not join the paid ranks themselves. There is not the least doubt that in a few years there will be a host of paid players with small salaries. Nor is there any harm in such a system. It is better for people to watch football than to loaf about and do nothing. As for the players, if they find it worth their while to train and keep fit for a few extra shillings a week neither their health nor their morals suffer, and their play is probably an improvement on that which they would have indulged in had they played as amateurs.

It is much better to have this open professionalism than the veiled system that prevails in the Rugby Union. The class of players is not materially different, and the secession of clubs in the north shows that professionalism is making headway. A club will win a county cup and then "'vert" to the paid ranks. This is the consequence of the Union's pig-headed obstinacy in dealing with the matter. These rulers seem to think they can restrain a movement which is gathering strength every season. Anybody can see that it is not professionalism that has harmed the Association game, but the fact that those who run the paid clubs control the game, and naturally they do so in the trade interest. But then it is impossible to expect any sense in a body which so stultified itself over the Gould case. These officials seem utterly unable to take a broad or reasonable view of the situation. The consequence is that not only does veiled professionalism still flourish, but the game has been spoiled by the hybrid innovations of the professional body that styles itself the Northern Union.

At the Horley Athletic Sports, in a scratch hundred, Jupp showed that he was improving. He ought to have been placed second instead of third; Wadsley was first and Palmer, the champion, was fourth. Nothing particularly good was done in the handicaps, in which the finishes were very close. At Ewell there was some serious racing, and H. N. Coltart won the Coates Cup, scoring the most points in the different events.

At Oxford Gold, who has thrice stroked the crew, has been elected president, and Herbert secretary. The crews are being got together for the eights week, but it is too early at present to criticise them. It is just as well that the American Press is otherwise occupied, or there would have been a terrible row over the rejection of Ten Eyck's entry for the Diamond Sculls by the Henley Committee. No doubt many people would rather that this young sculler's qualifications had not entitled him to row as an amateur. From all one can gather he has never done anything to infringe the A.R.A. definition. Some say the secret trial he rowed was the cause of his rejection. His conduct was wrong as measured by our English standards of sport. But this is dangerous ground, and the same test of unsportsmanlike conduct might now be a fatal bar to a certain competitor last year whose conduct has been referred to by a University journal in very stringent terms. There is a big beam in the domestic eye.

The Surrey Cycling Club in consequence of the alterations in progress at the Oval, had to hold their spring meeting at the Crystal Palace, where the wretched weather kept a lot of people away. In the half-mile Amateur Scratch Race Davies was first. There was a terrible amount of loafing in the final heat. It is a pity that amateurs indulge in such tactics over such a short distance. It will be always necessary to have a time limit. The ten mile challenge cup was won by Callaghan, after a close finish with McBourke. The winner has only to be successful on another occasion to secure the cup, having won this event in April of last year.

MAMMON.

From MOSES MOSS to BENJAMIN BOSS.

Sunday.

MY DEAR BEN,—Last week I commented upon the fact that recent events had emphasised the old Stock Exchange saying "that you can safely buy stocks after the first shot is fired." Of course, a great deal depends upon the state of affairs preceding the outbreak of war, and, in the present instance, the actual commencement of hostilities had been so much discounted by previous depression that "the first shot" found the markets prepared for a recovery. During the past week a further important improvement has taken place, which was due chiefly to the disappearance of fears of a further advance in the Money Market.

The Golden Current to the Bank.

I stated some weeks ago that the Bank of England had made arrangements, by granting advances without charging interest, to attract about a million sterling from Germany, the condition being that these advances were repayable in the precious metal. As Germany was a debtor on account of the new Chinese loan, the transaction was greatly facilitated, and I really must congratulate the Old Lady of Threadneedle-street upon the adoption of modern methods of finance, instead of the old-fashioned policy hitherto pursued. The result has been a very large influx of gold at the Bank of England, and the golden current is still flowing in the same direction. It would be rash to conclude that we shall have much cheaper money, but the change which has taken place will doubtless enable the London market to face the consequences of the Spanish-American war with comparative equanamity. The only dark spot which has not yet been eliminated is the collapse in the West Australian Market Trust group. Complications arose which it was impossible to remedy, and unfortunately a number of firms of jobbers and brokers interested in the West Australian Market have been declared defaulters. It is hoped now that some reconstruction of the Trust will finally adjust the matter. In the meantime, the other sections of the West Australian department have recovered from a serious reaction, and the high-class shares have been in demand. A very satisfactory feature has been a strong rally in the Kaffir Circus. That some such improvement would occur has been apparent for some time. There was hardly any floating stock in this market, and when the welcome news came to hand that the Transvaal Government had reduced the price of dynamite by 10s. per case, South African shares advanced all round, Rand Mines leading with a rise of three points. More concessions are talked of, and there seems now to be a prospect of the South African Market being re-established in public favour. The advances were not, however, confined to the Mining department. The greater ease in the Money Market caused an improvement in Home Railway stocks, South American Government and Railway stocks came into demand, and the Paris Bourse at one time developed a very optimistic tendency. Unfortunately, Paris operators are at present so much affected by any adverse movement in Spanish bonds, that a firm tone on the Paris Bourse can hardly be expected to prevail for any length of time. Yankee Rails have shown great strength. Our American cousins seem to have gathered unbounded confidence from the result of their first warlike operations, and their sweeping victory at Manila is certainly calculated to greatly encourage them. Notwithstanding the lukewarmness of European operators, Wall-street has succeeded in putting up values; and if the next naval engagement should have a similar result, a further rise would doubtless follow. A very satisfactory feature has been the sharp rise in Canadian Pacifics, concerning which I may take some credit, having recommended their purchase since they fell to 76, while they have now gone ahead to 84. The Industrial market has also suffered from the fears of dear money, and is now bracing up again; but there is little disposition on the part of promoters to launch new undertakings, for the very good reason no doubt that recent flotations have not met with any substantial support on the part of the public.

MONEY AND GILT-EDGED INVESTMENTS.

Rarely has the golden current to the Bank of England set in so suddenly, and in such volume, as in the last week or two. During the last ten days something like £2,700,000 has been received at the Bank, chiefly in German, French, and Austrian coin, with a few Japanese yens thrown in, and some arrivals of bar-gold, which have of late been quite scarce at the Bank of England. Further amounts of the precious metal are expected, and it is undoubtedly excellent policy to thus reinforce our stock of gold, so as to place the central institution in a position to face the autumn demands. Most of the gold is remitted against the proceeds of the new Chinese loan, and although it is hardly likely that this amount will be locked up by Japan, to whom it will eventually revert, there is yet no certainty that some of these sums may not eventually be withdrawn. The American demand for gold has for the time come to an end, but should the New York exchange continue to fall, it may again make its appearance. Under all the circumstances there is, therefore, little prospect of any reduction in the Bank rate, even though the discount for three months' Bank bills has dropped to 3½ per cent. In the meantime, gilt-edged investment stocks have naturally benefited by the change in the Money Market. Consols at 111⅛ are ⅞ higher for the week, and there has been a general rally in Home Railway Debentures and Preferences, while British Corporation stocks and Colonial Government bonds are also firmer. The Chinese loans have hardened, and the new loan is quoted 1½ discount, while Japanese bonds have improved to 101¾. Silver has advanced ⅜ to 26 5/16d., and the quotation for forward delivery is 26 3/16d.

HOME RAILS—A STRONG TONE.

Easy rates at the carry-over testified to the continued scarcity of stock in the Home Railway department, and this was before the large flow of gold to the Bank had developed. When it was seen that the supplies of the precious metal were assuming yet larger proportions, the "Bears" in this market took fright, and a further improvement was established. Thus we have Brighton "A" at 176¼, Dover "A" at 109½, while most other active stocks mark similar advances of from 1 to 2 points. Great Eastern, almost alone, are hanging back, owing to a delivery of real stock. The Heavy division has also experienced a moderate recovery, and South Western have gained a couple of points more. Great Centrals hardly moved throughout the depression, and are now very firm, the 1894 Ordinary at 39½, Great Central "A" at 21½. Metropolitan have risen to 128½, and Districts are very steady at 27⅜. A rally of nearly a point has occurred in Caledonian Deferred at 56¼, and in North British Deferred at 43. Central London Railway shares have been quiet, the fully-paid Ordinary remaining at 10¼.

THE YANKEE MARKET—LONDON LUKEWARM—WALL-STREET CONFIDENT.

It cannot be said that much change had occurred in the American department until the last day or two. The few slight engagements with the Spaniards in Cuba which had been reported were altogether unimportant, and although our Yankee cousins made a good deal of their success in the bombardment of the Matanzas forts, Spanish advices altogether belittled the supposed achievement, and reported the now historic mule as the only victim of the cannonade. The fight appears, however, to have given considerable encouragement to the American people, and Wall-street considered it worth a rise of a couple of dollars. On the London market there was at first a total disinclination to operate until some serious fighting should give an indication of the probable course of the conflict. This, it was expected, would be supplied by collisions between the United States and Spanish fleets off Manila, and between the flying squadron from Key West and the Spanish fleet now en route from the Cape Verde Islands. As a matter of fact, the decided victory of the American fleet at Manila which has just been announced has given quite a different turn to affairs, and it is permitted to look for a shorter campaign than seemed hitherto likely. In the meantime, those who took on my advice short turns by buying on declines and selling on recoveries have been able to secure fair profits. Milwaukee have fluctuated between 88½ and 90½, Louisville between 46½ and 49, the highest prices being now quoted. A good demand has been experienced for Northern Pacific Prefs. on favourable dividend rumours, the quotation being 60½, while the Common stock stands at 20½. Norfolk and Western Prefs. have been supported by good traffics, and are quoted 46½. Erie Prefs. were firm at one time, but have reacted again to 43. Union Pacifics have been a fairly active market, the Common at 19¾, the Prefs. at 53½. With reference to Louisville, a great deal depends upon the decision of the directors as to when they will commence paying dividends. I mentioned last week how the road will doubtless benefit for a time from the movement of troops; but then, on the other hand, it is not at all impossible that the yellow fever will again make its appearance in the south this season. If the outbreak assumes large proportions in Cuba this might easily aggravate the epidemic in the United States. With reference to pending reorganisations, an American contemporary remarks that every day some new feature of the Baltimore and Ohio reorganisation plan is discovered. The last is that the assessment on the stock is to be $20 a share, with a Preferred stock equivalent. It is further reported that the Pittsburg and Western is not treated in the plan, but is left for an independent reorganisation. The Union Pacific, Denver and Gulf plan makes no great headway, although it is practically decided that the stock shall get a good equivalent for a small assessment. On the other hand, the following is an extract from the Wall-street Journal concerning the Baltimore and Ohio:—

> We are told that the leading banking interests most closely connected with the reorganisation of Baltimore and Ohio control by purchase a clear majority of Baltimore and Ohio stock here and abroad. These interests have been steady buyers, as the stock has come to market in the last six months. The aim appears to be to control, by ownership or in trust, most of the issues likely to be affected in reorganisation, so that when the time comes to issue the plan there will be no delay in reorganisation. Mr. Little's investigations have been brought up to December 31 last, so that the reorganising interests are in possession of all the facts up to date. While it is true in one sense that the plan has been prepared by the reorganisation committee, that committee has had constant and valuable advice from the banking interests particularly involved, and they have, of course, been kept informed of all important developments as the work went along.

On the subject of the Central Pacific the San Francisco Examiner has the following:—"The fact that Mr. I. E. Gates was not made a Director of Central Pacific at the recent meeting is considered an indication of increased friction between Mr. Huntington and the Bretherton English syndicate. Mr. Huntington resigned as a Director last July and was not re-elected. The English stockholders have wanted Southern Pacific interests in the Central Pacific Board reduced. The Banbury Committee represents a majority of the London stock and the Bretherton Syndicate a minority. The results of the last election indicate that the Banbury Committee has made concessions to Bretherton. Mr. Huntington's idea is believed to be that if Central Pacific can remain in control of the Banbury majority, it may be kept in harmony with Southern Pacific. Otherwise there is a possibility that it may fall into the hands of the Union Pacific combination."

LONDON AND PARIS EXCHANGE, LTD., 24, Throgmorton-street, London, E.C. This Corporation is prepared to make Advances on Mining Shares, at 6 per cent. per annum, subject to a deposit of 20 per cent. Clients by this system save the heavy contangoes usually charged.

I have already referred to the excellent condition of the winter wheat, as stated by the U.S. Government and other reports. One of these days it will, of course, be a "Bull" point for the Grangers, and in connection with this subject, the following extract from the Wall-street Daily News will be read with interest:—

For the moment, of course, this has no bearing worth mentioning in influencing prices for the granger shares, but when tranquility is once more resumed and normal conditions obtain—provided they come within a reasonable time—these facts are bound to tell, and that in no uncertain manner. Winter wheat is raised in important quantities in six States, viz., California, Kansas, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. The principal roads in these States, excepting California, are:—

Burlington and Quincy	St. Paul
Rock Island	North Western
Missouri Pacific	Chicago Great Western
Atchison	Chicago and Alton
Union Pacific	Kansas and Texas

The Government crop report on winter wheat indicates that the yield for 1898, based on the same acreage as that of last year, together with the detail yield for the two previous years, is as follows:—

	Indicated, 1898. Bushels.	Yield, 1897. Bushels.	Yield, 1896. Bushels.
California	22,600,000	32,394,020	45,097,195
Kansas	53,400,000	47,998,152	30,794,452
Ohio.....	31,100,000	38,049,133	21,800,016
Indiana	34,700,000	32,675,201	20,647,440
Illinois	19,300,000	11,578,003	28,668,146
Missouri	19,300,000	14,104,458	16,594,473
Total	180,400,000	176,799,057	163,601,822

By the way, the figures of American trade with Spain and her colonies are attracting some attention now. It appears that in 1897 America imported $3,631,000 from Spain, and exported $10,912,000 of goods; but this is already a very considerable falling off from former figures. The American import trade to Cuba last year was $18,400,000, and the exports were $8,200,000. This is stated to be a decrease of $60,000,000 in the import trade from the highest in former years, and of $16,000,000 from the highest exports. It is evident that even from this point of view alone the acquisition or control of the Pearl of the Antilles is a somewhat tempting bait for the United States, as no doubt the bulk of the trade would be got hold of by our Yankee cousins. American imports from the Philippine Islands in 1897 amounted to $4,300,000, and the exports to only $94,000. But it is hardly likely that if the United States were to conquer the Philippine Islands, the European Powers would allow her to retain possession of the same, even if so minded.

The Advance in Canadian Pacifics.

For some time I have expressed a very favourable view of the position of the Canadian Pacific road, and I have explained how the war between the United States and Spain, instead of damaging the Canadian Pacific, would, on the contrary, benefit it. Latest cablegrams from Montreal fully confirm this view, as large quantities of goods are being diverted from American roads to Canadian lines for export to Europe viâ Canadian ports, so as not to incur the risk of capture by Spanish vessels. Again, goods from Europe will, no doubt, be sent by the Canadian route in preference, and passengers will also prefer to land in or start from Canadian ports, rather than travel from the Atlantic ports of the United States, which are now mostly mined, while other inconveniences would probably be incurred. Finally, the Montreal correspondent of the Standard states that instead of going to their own seaside resorts, or taking their usual trip to Europe, many American families propose to spend the summer months on the Canadian seaboard, so as to avoid the troubles connected with the war. Here, then, are a number of "Bull" points, shared, of course, in a measure by the Grand Trunk, while the chief drawback has been of late the war of rates which threatened to prevent the two Canadian roads from enjoying to the full the advantages enumerated above. During the last week reports were received in usually well-informed quarters, which pointed to a settlement of the rate war, chiefly through the Canadian Pacific making concessions, and the fact that considerable purchases were made for Montreal account, resulting in an advance from 76 to 84, was taken to mean that the inner circle were aware of the fact that a definite decision to give way had been taken. Until, however, some official statement is made, it is impossible to be certain on this point. In the meantime, the following latest mail news from the Wall-street Journal is not encouraging:—

The defeat of the Kettle River Valley Bill in the Ottawa Parliament is regarded as a defeat, not merely for Mr. Corbin but for the Grand Trunk and the American roads interested with the Grand Trunk. It is supposed that one of the principal factors in bringing about the defeat was the North-Western passenger rate war and particularly the action of the Inter-State Commerce Commission in helping the American roads by suspending the long and short haul clause. Public opinion in many parts of the dominion was apparently in favour of Mr. Corbin getting his charter, but the Canadian Pacific influence at Ottawa proved too strong. The indications are that the defeat of this Bill will have the effect of making the fight between Canadian Pacific and the American roads with the Grand Trunk more bitter than ever. The suggestion has been made in some quarters that as a means of bringing a fight to the end the matter should be left in the hands of the executive officers of the various roads. In so far as this suggestion may convey the idea that the policy of the American Roads has not been clearly laid down by the principal officers of those roads, it is a mistake. It is understood that President Hill of the Great Northern is steadfast in his determination that under no circumstances shall Canadian Pacific demands be acceded to by the North-West roads.

Notwithstanding the war of rates, the Canadian Pacific is doing excellent business, the last weekly traffic return showing an increase of $87,000; while the working statement for March shows a gross increase of $550,000, and a net increase of $233,000. It is evident, therefore, that the Canadian Pacific is not suffering much from the rate war, whatever effect it may have on the other roads concerned. The Grand Trunk weekly traffic showed an increase of only £2,733, and it remains to be seen whether the next returns will be more favourable. The Grand Trunk statement for March is very satisfactory, a gross increase of £50,014 working out to a net gain of £25,897. In the meantime Grand Trunks have hardened in sympathy with Canadian Pacifics, the Guaranteed to 74½, the First Prefs. to 69⅛.

The Foreign Market—Paris Troubles—Rally in South Americans.

The Paris Bourse is not happy, and although it now and then rouses itself to put prices up, the upward movements are not sustained. One reason of the inherent weakness is, of course, the trouble of the Coulisse, to which I have already drawn attention. Another drawback is the fact that French investors and operators are very largely interested in Spanish bonds, and the heavy fall which has taken place is being severely felt. The recovery to 34 in Spanish has not, unfortunately, been maintained, as the financial outlook in Madrid is being viewed with grave concern. The War Budget has created a disagreeable impression, and shows to what shifts Spain is driven to pay for her armaments. It is hardly likely that the internal loan will yield much, and none of the French or English financiers care to look at the Almaden Quicksilver Mines as security for further borrowing. The chronic want of cash experienced by Spain is, in fact, likely to have a more powerful influence upon the fortunes of that country than the Yankee fleet. Every now and then rumours are rife that the Spanish Government may in some way interfere with the Rio Tinto Mines by taxing copper, or by some other impost, and as Rio Tintos are the favourites of the Paris Bourse, this is another source of weakness. Thus it has come to pass that Paris had to throw overboard sound South African mining shares, such as De Beers, East Rands, &c., although this movement has now almost come to an end. The Greek loan is to be issued on the 10th inst., and will doubtless be well received, especially as the money market shows greater ease. The South American department has braced up, and important advances were established ever since the fears of an advance in the Bank rate passed away. The Argentine Funding Loan has risen two points during the week to 86½, while the 1886 Loan has gained a point at 88, and Buenos Ayres Water and Drainage bonds have improved to 69. Argentine railway stocks, too, have hardened, Buenos Ayres Great Southern having risen five points to 144, while Buenos Ayres and Rosario have gained two at 70, Central Argentine improving to a like extent at 77½ xd. Cordoba Central (Central Northern Section) Income Debenture stock has at last moved up to 48, as the last traffic return shows a smaller decrease, which is considered a hopeful sign. Strong efforts have been made to engineer a recovery in Brazilians, and the 1889 Loan has rallied to 46½, and the Western of Minas to 47½. Hopes are entertained that the Vice-President Elect of Brazil, who is coming to London in order to try his hand at improving the financial position, may succeed in his mission. Mexican Sixes have gone ahead further, the Old Loan to 94½. Uruguay bonds are much stronger, the Old Loan at 44⅜x.d., the New Loan to 54½. The news from Monte Video is to the effect that President Cuestas is gradually introducing suitable reforms. Peruvian Corporation stocks were flat at one time, but they have since recovered to 39 for the Debentures, and to 9 for the Prefs. It is reported that the protocol with Chili regarding the plébiscite on the question of returning the provinces of Tacna and Arica to Peru was signed on April 22, and that the terms are favourable to Peru.

The Kaffir Circus—A Sharp Advance.

Although the week opened dull, and the carry-over in South African mining shares took place at a very low level, a sharp recovery set in almost immediately after the make-up. The speculative account was shown to be exceedingly moderate, and in fact there was evidence of considerable "Bear" commitments; while on the other hand contangoes were easy, notwithstanding the prediction of dear money which were then still current. Active buying for influential firms followed on advices from Pretoria, according to which the Transvaal Government has decided to reduce the price of dynamite by 10s. per case. Of this reduction, 5s. is to be deducted from the Government's share of the profits, and 5s. from the share of the Dynamite Company. It was stated, moreover, that further concessions would be made, and it is evident that Oom Paul has at last realised that in order to obtain a loan from European financiers he will have to put himself right with the mining industry. Such a loan is a necessity for the Transvaal, and it will not even be granted by the Transvaal's former dear friends, the Germans, as they have fully realised that the policy of obstruction adopted by the Transvaal Government is inimical to the interests of the large number of German investors who are holding South African mining shares. The articles which recently appeared in the Cologne Gazette, and to which I drew attention at the time, have no doubt had their share in the change of front executed by President Kruger, and as it will also be in the interest of the South African Republic itself, this fresh turn in the kaleidoscope of Boer politics is to be welcomed. It is believed that the next step will be a reduction in railway freights, and that suitable measures for the enforcement of the liquor law, and for providing a satisfactory supply of water for the mines, will follow. So far, of course, the upward movement has been only professional, but when further concessions are granted, public buying will also be induced. It will be remembered that the public have for a long time been told that in order to place the mining industry on a proper footing, such concessions must be made by the Transvaal Government. So strongly has this been impressed upon investors in Europe, that the big South African financiers finally discovered that they could not expect any support from the public until it pleased the Transvaal Executive to give way. This was a somewhat unrehearsed effect, and it was hardly justified by the position, as the rich mines were already producing large profits, and the concessions demanded would only to a moderate extent increase their yield. On the other hand, these reductions will be important for the low grade mines, many of which, if further suitable concessions are granted, would become profitable propositions. But it should again be pointed out at this juncture that the Transvaal mining industry is already making splendid progress. The March crushings of the Witwatersrand mines provided another record, and from the report for the year 1897, issued by the Chamber of Mines, the production of the Transvaal for that year amounted to 3,034,678 oz. of gold, of a value of £10,583,616, this figure representing one-fifth of the gold production of the world. No less than 753,785 oz. were in 1897 added to the output of 1896, and thus £2,719,275 more were obtained from Transvaal gold mines in 1897 than in 1896, while the amount of dividends distributed last year reached £2,713,580. Looking at these magnificent figures, and taking into consideration the reductions in working cost which are now to be made, one cannot help anticipating a very considerable further improvement in the values of sound South African mining and finance shares. Rand Mines were carried over on April 26 at 26⅜. They have since advanced to 29¾, reacting to 29⅛. East Rands, which carried over at 3$\frac{15}{16}$, have risen to 4⅜, and Consolidated Goldfields of South Africa from 3$\frac{13}{16}$ have improved to 4$\frac{3}{16}$. Randfontein from the make-up price of 1$\frac{5}{16}$ have gone to 1$\frac{9}{16}$, and a number of other shares show similar advances. One of the shares which has moved up to a considerable extent is Simmer and Jack, which carried over at 2⅝, and are now at 3$\frac{1}{16}$. Some weeks ago I foreshadowed the figures of the Simmer and Jack report for the year 1897. The report has now arrived by mail, and fully confirms my remarks. £259,705 of gold was won at an expense of £193,130, and the working costs have been reduced from 26s. 9·77d. in 1896 to 23s. 6·51d. in 1897. This is all the more favourable in view of the change which has taken place from the old 100-stamp mill to the new 280-stamps. The net profit for the year, derived from gold, &c., showed a balance to credit of £57,134, while the net profit on sales of investments reached £353,120, a total of £410,254. The proceeds of the sale of investments are being devoted to the further redemption of the debenture debt and to capital expenditure requirements. Of the issue of £500,000 debentures which was made in June, 1896, there had been redeemed during the year 1897 debentures amounting to £191,400, leaving outstanding at December 31, 1897, £308,600. The shareholdings realised consisted chiefly of Rose Deep, Simmer and Jack East, and Simmer and Jack West. The Company now also holds, free from all liability, the freehold estate Elandsfontein, including 859 claims, and the following shares:—Rand Victoria Mines, 93,070 shares (£1 each fully paid up, with right to subscribe 40,611 shares at £2 each); General Electric Power Company, 64,000 shares (£1 each, nothing paid up at December 31, 1897); Simmer and Jack West, 411 shares (£1 each, fully paid up); Rand Mutual Assurance, 133 shares (£10 each, £5 paid up). The prospects of the Company are, under all the circumstances, and as matters in South Africa are brightening, of a very satisfactory character. Goldfields Deep, which made up at 7⅝, have since risen to 8$\frac{9}{16}$, and advances have generally taken place in the Deep Level mines. The firmer tone for diamond shares has continued, and De Beers have improved to 26.

Golden West Australia.—Further Rally After Renewed Weakness.

Contrary to the hope which had been entertained a week ago, that the affairs connected with the speculative account of the West Australian Market Trust would be arranged, this trouble at one time assumed serious proportions, and has, unfortunately, led to a number of failures of jobbers and brokers. Of the total number of eight firms which defaulted, however, no more than six were directly brought to the ground by the West Australian trouble, and should further difficulties be prevented, the mischief done would prove smaller than had been at one time anticipated, when the rumour-mongers talked of a score of failures coming off. It is proposed to reconstruct the Market Trust with a liability per share, and if this measure can be carried out, it will doubtless place matters on a better footing, and prevent any further serious difficulty. Amidst this unfortunate speculative collapse, it is a matter for congratulation that the general West Australian market has held up remarkably well, smart recoveries occurring in several instances. In the first instance, Great Boulder Proprietary, on large inside buying, and on cablegrams advising satisfactory developments on the property, rose to 20s. Lake View Consols have gone ahead sharply to 8⅛ x.d., the dividend of 10s. per share just having been despatched to the shareholders. As this is equal to 8⅝ cum dividend, it is evident that Lake View Consols have resumed their place as a leader of the market. Ivanhoe, of the same group, have improved to 5, and London and Globe Finance have recovered to 1½. Mr. Whitaker Wright has now returned from the Riviera, and will shortly bring out the Standard Exploration Company, which is to be formed for the purpose of taking over the subcompanies, which have now all agreed to the amalgamation. The following is the list of crushings for the week:—

—	Tons of Ore Crushed.	Oz. of Gold.	Assay of Tailings per ton.
Lady Evelyn	146	277	—
Middlesex Gold Mines	70	75	—
North-West Australian Goldfields	150	223	—
Bayley's United	179 lb.	202	—
,, ,, (Tailings)	894	808	—
Belle Vue Proprietary	196	417	—
Weld-Hercules	237	198	6 dwt.
Londonderry	320	582	—
North Burgess	35	232	—
Rose Hill United	100	47	6 dwt.
,, ,,	100	37	14¼ dwt.
,, ,,	100	45	4 dwt.
White Feather Main Reef	820	1,050	—
Cuddingwarra	334	288	20 dwt.

One of the most interesting items in the above list is the crushing of the North-West Australian Goldfields. This mine has hitherto been considered a dark horse, but the following cablegram from Mr. Isdell, the Manager of the Company's Nullagine property, is distinctly promising:—"All telegraphic communication stopped on account of breakage since April 2; commenced crushing April 5; cleaned up April 15 150 tons; result, 223 (oz.) smelted gold; mill working splendidly." If crushings were to continue at the rate of 1½ oz. of gold per ton, the shareholders might have the satisfaction of seeing the price of the shares, which is now nominally ½ to ⅝, improve considerably. Hannan's Brownhill are firm at 7⅛. According to a cablegram received by the London and Hamburg Gold Recovery Company, the new plant on this mine is getting into working order, and the engines are running well. This should foreshadow the commencement of gold extraction on a large scale on the Hannan's Brownhill. Sons of Gwalia, of the same group, have been firm throughout at 2 1/16. The underlay has been driven on for a distance of 60 ft., and according to a British Australasian cablegram the lode is still 5 ft. wide, and averages 3 oz. per ton. 8,000 tons of tailings, worth over 1 oz. to the ton, are awaiting treatment. According to a cablegram from the same source, the East Murchison United at the 170 ft. level have cut a new lode, 2 ft. wide, assaying 2 oz. of gold to the ton. 17,000 tons of tailings, worth 12 dwt. per ton, are stated to be awaiting treatment, while the Directors have just declared another dividend of 1s. per share. From the Great Boulder Main Reef property it is reported that rich telluride is being raised from the winze below the 170 ft. level. Lady Shenton shares have improved to 2 3/16. Mail advices are now to hand concerning the inspection of this mine by the Governor and Sir John Forrest, on the occasion of the opening of the railway to Menzies. It is stated that on this occasion most attention was directed to the winze from which the last rich crushing was obtained, and which gives evidence of its ability to render many more thousands of ore of equal quality. The lode at this point is described as fully 6 ft. wide, of an average value of from 3 to 4 oz. The mine has so far turned out over £100,000 in gold, and paid £32,000 in dividends, while another distribution is about to be made. Mr. Rayfield, the manager, mentioned that they had been satisfied with treating the low-grade ore, while opening up the deeper levels, which are now turning out so well. Leading mining men have, according to Mr. Rayfield, expressed the view that the lower levels in the Lady Shenton Mine were equal to anything outside Kalgoorlie, and he added that at the present time there was eight months' supply of rich ore in sight, without counting future developments. He believed that the Lady Shenton, like Menzies itself, was still in its infancy, and that the rich sulphide lodes discovered were sure to be met with in other properties on the same line, and the workings throughout, as far as they had gone, gave every indication of permanence. This emphatic statement is also of importance to the Florence, which adjoins the Lady Shenton, and in which the Shenton Lode has been struck. At anything like their present price Florence shares would appear promising. According to mail advices a sulphide ore lode has been struck on the Golden Pike Mine, in a crosscut at the 400 ft. level, which is estimated to be worth 1 oz. per ton. The Secretary of the Northern Territories Goldfields of Australia has issued the following statement:—

A sample of ore taken from Brock's Creek, and recently sent over by the general manager for assay, having been submitted to a leading firm of metallurgists in London for treatment, the following report has just been received:—"The sample lot of ore which we received from you on the 18th inst. was all ground to a coarse powder, quartered down to a few pounds, finally ground to pass through a very fine sieve, and assayed with the following results: Gold, 6 oz. 20 gr. per ton; silver, 15 dwt. 16 gr. per ton."

An important rally in Golden Horseshoes to 6 15/16 appears to have been due to repurchases by "Bears," who had imprudently taken liberties with these shares. A marked recovery has also taken place in Associated Gold Mines, which are up again at 3⅛, while Northern Territories are quoted 1, West Australian Joint Stock Trust are quoted ⅞, the Founders having improved to ⅜-½. The letter concerning Gladiators, Limited, which appeared in TRUTH of April 21, has brought me several other communications from shareholders in this Company, who are strongly of opinion that some statement should at once be made as regards the number of shares taken up in the reconstructed undertaking, and the action of the vendors in the matter, who, it is believed, still hold a large number of the shares. The Directors are Mr. N. Brown (Chairman), Messrs. M. T. Brown, C. J. Buckland, J. C. Jesson, J. McDonald, and F. Major, and I herewith call upon them to make an official statement in this matter. The questions asked are whether the vendors have taken up all their shares in the new Company, and what are the latest developments on the mine. I am not surprised that shareholders in the Great Fingall Reefs, Limited, should suggest that the concern be wound up. The property acquired seems to be altogether hopeless, and as there is from £30,000 to £40,000 of cash, it would be as well to wind up and distribute the money to the holders of the 110,000 shares. With reference to the Menzies Golden Rhine, a very favourable impression has been created by the action of Mr. John Waddington, the vendor, in providing the Company with a new property, free of charge, in a very good position, and favourably reported upon by the experts. I hope that Mr. Waddington's example will be followed by other promoters, most of whom are unfortunately very thick-skinned, and have very little regard for their shareholders. At Thursday's meeting of shareholders of the Hill End Consols particulars were given of the new property acquired, viz., the Pride of Arrow, and it would appear that the Company has now a fair chance of success, subject always, of course, to the uncertainties of mining. Concerning the alluvial difficulty at Peak Hill, some contradictory news is to hand. The decision in the Supreme Court appears to be to the effect that the alluvial miners are entitled to enter in search of gold, and while the warden at Peak Hill has decided that cement is not alluvial, and has issued notices to prevent the mines from entering the leases, the Government geologist states that cement is alluvial. This is a case of "doctors differing." The gold exports of the colony for April have been cabled as 84,083 oz., of the value of £319,517, which compares with the total of 83,776 oz. exported in March, and with 39,660 oz., of the value of £150,709 exported during April, 1897. On the other hand, the revenue for the past month amounted to only £209,859, as compared with £237,961 for the corresponding month of last year.

Indian, Australasian, and British Columbian Mines.

A somewhat firmer tone has also prevailed in the other departments of the mining market, and Indian shares are somewhat better. Ooregum Ordinary and Prefs., Balaghat, and Mysore Gold have improved; but there are a few declines, notably in Nundydroog and Mysore Reefs. In Australian shares, other than West Australian, Mount Lyells have improved on statements that the late Mr. Crotty's shares will not come on the market. Mount Lyell have thereupon recovered to 12⅞, Mount Lyell North, however, being quoted 2 7/16 only. Mount Morgan are firmer at 4⅛. In Croydon shares Croydon Consols are somewhat firmer on the last news from the property, which is to the effect that very promising quartz is now being extracted, showing gold in the pan. It is therefore possible that the reef will be struck again soon. According to the same cable a body of water has been struck draining the workings of the No. 7 Golden Gate; 227 tons have been cyanided for 254 oz. of bullion. The Aladdin's Lamp have obtained a return of 465 oz. of gold in four weeks, which is not satisfactory. In Charters Towers Mines, Day Dawn Block have improved. British Broken Hill are dull, and Broken Hill Proprietary are steady at 2 3/16. In the general foreign section, Linares have dropped heavily, but Frontino have improved. In British Columbian Mines movements have been irregular, but the better-class mines are somewhat firmer. Klondike and Columbian Goldfields have improved to 1⅛-¼, while London and British Columbian Goldfields and Whitewater Mines have been fairly steady. On the other hand, a reaction has occurred in Vancouver and British Columbia General Exploration and in Lilooet, Fraser River, and Cariboo Goldfields, while Dawson City (Klondike) Dominion Trading, New Golden Twins, and Alf Gold are also the turn easier. British America Corporation have been fairly well maintained at 19s. 6d. The Corporation is putting its shoulders to the wheel, and good results seem to be a foregone conclusion. According to the Rossland (B.C.) correspondent of the Financial News, the Hon. C. H. Mackintosh, of the British America Corporation, left Ottawa on April 9 en route for Rossland, and Mr. W. A. Carlyle will arrive there in a few days to commence extensive mining operations for the Corporation. The last issue to hand of the British Columbia Mining Critic also states that Mr. D. J. Macdonald, provincial inspector of mines, has resigned his Government appointment and followed Mr. Carlyle's example in accepting a position at Rossland under the British America Corporation. The corporation's policy is evidently to secure good practical aides to the Hon. Mr. Mackintosh and his director colleagues. Golden River Quesnelle have been dealt in at 5s. The following cablegram has just been received from the managing director at Victoria:—"Have just returned from dam. Mr. Loveridge (the company's manager) washed 336 cubic yards in several places; only one clean-up bedrock; rich spots on purpose were not selected; result, over 38 oz. of gold." In copper shares Rio Tinto showed a marked advance at 27, and most other copper shares are firmer, Utah being quoted 1⅞. According to the manager's report of the Utah Consolidated Mines, nine shipments were made during March containing from 9·65 to 11·3 per cent. of copper, besides small quantities of gold and silver.

China and Glass. — Messrs. Goode, Artists and Designers, solicit an inspection of their collection in their recently-extended South Audley-street premises, now by far the largest and most important in Europe. Messrs. Goode guarantee the excellence of all their productions, and invite a comparison of their prices with those of any co-operative stores.

New Enterprises and Issues.

The prospectuses of the following new enterprises and issues have been placed before the public during the week:—

The North Mount Lyell Copper Company, Limited.—This is an issue of £200,000 Five per Cent. First Mortgage Debentures at par, redeemable at £105 in 1908, or at any date during their currency on six months' notice at £110. The debentures will be secured by a trust deed upon the entire undertaking and property of the Company. The capital is £500,000, in £1 shares, of which 465,000 have been issued fully paid, and 35,000 are reserved for future issue.

Mellin's Food Company for Australia and New Zealand, Limited.—With a share capital of £125,000, divided into 100,000 Six per Cent. Cumulative Preference, and 25,000 Ordinary shares of £1 each, this company has been formed to acquire the business as now carried on with the Australian and New Zealand Colonies by Mellin's Food, Limited, proprietors of Mellin's Food for Infants and Invalids.

Furness, Withy, & Company, Limited.—This is an issue of 30,000 Five per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares of £10 each, at a premium of 20s. per share. The Company was incorporated in 1891 with a capital of £1,000,000 to acquire the business of the Christopher Furness line of steamers, and that of Edward Withy & Company, shipbuilders and repairers, and graving dock proprietors, West Hartlepool.

The North of England Theatre Corporation, Limited.—This Corporation was incorporated in 1897 to acquire the Theatre Royal, Rotherham; the Theatre Royal, Chesterfield; the Theatre Royal (Attercliffe) Sheffield, and to undertake theatrical, music-hall, and entertainment business generally, the share capital being fixed at £50,000, of which 13,352 have been issued. The present issue is of £12,500 Six per Cent. £1 Preference shares at par, and 14,148 Ordinary shares of £1 each at a premium of 2s. 6d. per share.

The Provincial issues that have been floated for the purpose of catering for public amusement have not, up to now, been much of a success, and there is nothing in this one to recommend.

The New Italian Opera Syndicate Limited.—With a share capital of £30,000 in shares of £1 each, and an issue of £20,000 in 400 Mortgage Debenture bonds of £50 each, this Syndicate has been formed to exploit a new operatic enterprise for the purpose of popularising high-class music.

Syndicate Touts on the War-Path.

The syndicate touts seem to have been scotched but not killed, for they are now raising their heads again. Even Alexander Baring & Co., stock and share dealers, 11, Bridge-street, Bath, continue to disseminate their impudent circulars, inviting participation in their "co-operative system of successful Stock Exchange dealing." I have repeatedly warned my readers against these people, and I would again urge them to give these touts a wide berth. It stands to reason that being located in Bath such a firm, even if it carried on a serious business, would be at a great disadvantage as compared with stockbrokers located in London, and the promised weekly profits of £5 per £100, which are held out as a bait, are really too absurd. Another firm which is resuming work is Davenport & Co., stockbrokers, head offices, 18a, London-street, London, E.C., and at Wall-street, New York. These are the touts who are working the "double operation guaranteed system," opening a "Bull" and "Bear" at the same time. I have repeatedly explained how this system is absolutely fallacious. Finally, I have received from a reader of Truth a circular which had been sent to him by the British and Foreign Investment Association, stock and share dealers, 4, Featherstone Buildings, Holborn, London. The secretary of this concern, Mr. J. J. Bevington, invites participation in what he calls "amalgamations," which offer "a means whereby very large profits may be made combined with the smallest amount of risk." These "amalgamations" are deals for which shares of £5 each are taken, and which are not to run longer than twenty-one days. But the following is the most important paragraph of the circular:—

> At the same time, we would call the attention of many of our clients, who prefer to know the exact amount of profit they can expect on an outlay of capital, that we pay a guaranteed income of £5 weekly on each £100 deposited with us for our discretionary investments, and larger or smaller amounts in proportion, and at the same time the capital can always be withdrawn by giving a few days' notice.

The fact that an income of £5 per week is promised, or rather guaranteed, on each £100, being at the rate of 260 per cent. per annum, obviously constitutes the most serious danger signal.

My Letter Box.

The following are replies to inquiries from various correspondents:—

Government, &c., Bonds.

F. J.—1. The Argentine 1886 and Funding Loans are fair purchases at present quotations. 2. Uruguay bonds should certainly be held for a substantial improvement. Neptune.—No reason to sell Peruvian Corporation stocks. The Republic appears to be on good terms with Chili, and the proposed arrangements with regard to the occupied provinces should prove satisfactory.

Banks, Trusts, and Financial.

Argentine.—I cannot give you any information on this point. You should apply to the liquidator of the New English Bank of the River Plate. J. E. M.—Yes, this is a high-class London bank, and there is no reason why you should not deposit the trust money with it. Worried, Connaught.—I really cannot undertake to act as arbitrator between your solicitor and yourself. This is a matter which lies entirely within your own decision, but I should think that a respectable practitioner would not endeavour to take advantage of you.

Home Rails.

Red Rover.—Thanks. It is quite correct that the rise in Brighton "A" and Dover "A" was duly predicted by me, and I am glad that you have benefited by my advice.

American and Foreign Rails.

Katharine.—I can only again advise you to hold your American Rails. You will be sure to come out all right, although you may have to wait for some time. C. I. P.—Although you have gone into American Rails slightly above the present level of prices, I think you are quite right in your intention to keep the same, as an important improvement is quite on the cards. Nemo, Glasgow.—Nothing fresh has transpired with regard to this Argentine Railway, but as soon as advices come to hand I will not fail to fully refer to the matter. South Norwood.—1. No dividend has yet been paid on Union Pacific Prefs., but there is every prospect of a distribution within the next few months, and they are a fair purchase. I think you are quite misinformed as to my action with regard to the Bill in question. Will you please to refer me to the remarks to which you take exception. Inquirer, Hanover-square.—Yes, I still consider these American Railroad bonds a good investment.

Mining Shares.

M. J. D., Leeds.—South African shares have taken a turn for the better, and prospects appear so much improved, that I advise you to hold your shares. Wilts.—You had better not buy any of the shares, Nos. 1 to 5, until the present difficulties in this group have been arranged. Then they will be a good purchase. London and Globes (6) are very promising. Spec.—I would not advise you to buy any of these shares until matters have settled down, when you will doubtless be able to do a satisfactory deal. W. G.—1. A recovery is probable. 2. No market. 3. Lady Shentons have never fallen to 1½, and are now quoted 2⅛, with every prospect of a rise. The latest information is very satisfactory. Spes.—No reason to sell your Great Boulder Proprietary; hold for a recovery. Latest advices from the mine are satisfactory. Greenhorn.—1. Londonderry are not improving in the first instance, because no decision has yet been given with reference to the money due from the late Colonel North's estate. Secondly, because the West Australian market is very dull just now. 2. I do not hold a favourable view of the Para Rubber Company, recently floated. D. C. L.—Randfontein and Buffelsdoorn should be held, and if you can afford it you should average these now. Prospects are becoming much more favourable. Yukon.—If you want to invest in British Columbian or in Yukon enterprises you will have to be very careful in your selections, and the Yukon Company mentioned by you is not promising. British America Corporation, on the other hand, are one of the best purchases, and Klondike and Columbian Goldfields, London and British Columbia Goldfields, and Whitewater Mines are also very promising. J. P.—1. I really cannot advise you with regard to this matter. As soon as the worst is over I should say that the group would rally. 2. You must be guided by the events which are at present in progress. Pioneer.—Yes, Lady Shenton and Ivanhoe are a good purchase, and you might add Hannan's Brownhill, Florence, and Sons of Gwalia. Ndjole.—After the decline it would not be wise to sell. Hold London and Globe, and average if you can afford to do so. Robertus.—This has been a very disappointing mine, but it may come right all the same. M. F. E.—There is no option but to hold these shares, which are at present at the very lowest, and hope for a rally. Holywell.—No, I do not think it would be preferable to throw good money after bad in the case of the Achilles Mine. Cork.—1. Possibly, but not at once. 2. A fair investment, but in the present condition of the West Australian market you must not expect any startling advances. 3. It is too late now to clear out; you must await a recovery. B. H. W.—1. All depends upon further developments at the mine, and the possibility of obtaining some money in return. 2. There was absolutely no reason for the recent decline in Lake View Consols, and they have now recovered to 8¼x.d. You will, however, remember that when they rose to 12 I advised my readers to clear their profits. 3. These are promising, and so are British America Corporation shares. M.—I sincerely sympathise with you. It is a pity that you should have committed yourself so largely, but there is still a prospect of the matter being put right, and I would strongly advise you to see the man himself, and to place the matter before him. I should think that he would act fairly. With reference to London and Globe and British America Corporation shares, these should certainly be held for an improvement. In fact, most of the markets are likely to further rally now, including the West Australian department.

Industrial Shares.

Zero.—I think you had better hold Welsbach Ordinary for the present, especially as the insiders are again supporting the stock. Mother.—There was a very severe decline in Welsbach stocks at one time, but this is being partly recovered, and I would not advise you to be frightened out at present. Wheelman.—I quite agree with you that the fall in Cycle shares has been very heavy, but it was a craze at the time, and a reaction followed. I am afraid that no important improvement is probable just yet. Knock.—I quite agree with you that these pneumatic tyre shares have experienced a sharp decline, but I do not think that the time to buy has yet come. O. D., Manchester.—Your list of Industrial shares, Nos. 1 to 8, over which you propose to divide a portion of the amount, seems to be a suitable one, with the exception perhaps of No. 7, which is very speculative. Great Central, 1894, Ordinary, are certainly a promising lock-up. Investor, Athenæum.—No fresh information is available. Caution.—I am afraid that if you undertook to pay for these shares you will be compelled to pay up. This is, of course, entirely against my repeated warnings. Stoke.—The Preference shares No. 1 seem to be a fair investment. With regard to No. 2, so much depends upon arrangements to be made with the local authorities, that I should not advise you to incur the liability. 3. No catch. Desirous.—I gave a full list of Home Brewery and Industrial Debentures in TRUTH of April 14, amongst which the following should suit you, as yielding from 4 to 6 per cent.:—Northampton Brewery Five per Cent. Debenture stock at 126, Watney & Co.'s Five per Cent. Debenture stock at 115, Brush Electric Four and a Half per Cent. Debenture stock at 112, Welford & Sons' Four and a Half per Cent. Redeemable debentures at 108, and Savoy Hotel Five per Cent. Debenture stock at 102½. To these may be added J. and J. Yardley & Company's Five and a Half per Cent. Cumulative Prefs. at 5, Buckley's Brewery Five and a Quarter per Cent. Cumulative Prefs. at 10¾, and Manchester Brewery Seven per Cent. Cumulative Prefs. at 17. Constant Reader, Sheffield.—1. I really cannot supply information about wine merchants. 2. The British Drying Company is a very speculative concern, and I do not advise a purchase of the shares. 3. A fair investment. Archimedes.—1. Both these Companies are speculative, but not bad of their kind. 2. Impossible to tell.

Mixed Investments.

Yat Sikh.—1. I will inquire whether this Ottoman Bond has been drawn. 2. No particular reason to sell now. M. S. R.—A. No reason to sell these Brewery shares now. B. No catch. C. No option but to hold. There is a possibility of this company coming right. D. I should not like to offer an opinion. Optimist.—1. Lake View Consols are now quoted 8⅛ ex. the dividend of 10s. per share, and will doubtless further recover. Do not forget, however, that I advised realising profits in these shares when quoted at £12. 2. I do not like this Dairy Company. 3. A fair industrial investment, although somewhat speculative. Ruby.—Certainly hold the Home Railway stocks Nos. 1 and 2; also Randfontein (3). Of the latter you might now buy more to average. I do not like the Music Hall shares No. 4. With reference to the last question, I must refer you to "A Chapter on Industrial Stocks." S. N. P.—The dividend warrants of Yardley Brewery Prefs. have just been posted. The shares yield 5½ per cent., and are a good investment. Argentine.—1. No catch. 2. Impossible to tell. 3. You must supply fuller particulars. 4. Your best plan is to go to the Life Office itself and obtain the surrender value. Monkey.—1. No, I do not advise investment in this Kootenay concern. 2. A fair investment of the kind, but no catch. Heather Bell.—1. You have a good deal to learn yet if you think that every mining share pays dividends, and that a fall of 10 per cent. in such a share is an enormity. The Consolidated Murchison is doing well, and, having been recently reconstructed, has got ample working capital. 2. The shares of the daily financial paper in question are a good investment, but for particulars you had better apply to the secretary. The shares of Nos. 3 and 4 are not in the market, and No. 5 is very speculative. Apply to Mr. Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange, London, E.C., for books on Stock Exchange matters. Doverian.—Brighton "A," Dover "A," and Caledonian Deferred Ordinary (Coras) would be suitable for the investment of the £3,000 in question. I am glad to learn that you have often invested money satisfactorily on my advice. Victoria X.—Yes, Nos. 1–3 are good investments. Kinsale.—1. Not as far as I know. 2. A good investment of the kind. Disgusted.—You are not the only man who has been disappointed in the course of Stock Exchange prices during recent months. But what can you expect when a great war upsets all calculations? The trouble in the West Australian market, of course, fully explains the weakness in some of the shares mentioned by you, which should, of course, prove temporary only. 1. Hold Chilians. 2. Certainly hold Johnnies. A recovery seems now on the cards. 3. No option but to hold.

Old False Teeth Bought.—Many ladies and gentlemen have by them old or disused false teeth, which might as well be turned into money. Messrs. R. D. & J. B. Fraser, of Princes-street, Ipswich (established since 1833), buy old false teeth. If you send your teeth to them they will remit you by return post the utmost value; or, if preferred, they will make you the best offer, and hold the teeth over for your reply. If reference necessary, apply to Messrs. Bacon & Co., Bankers, Ipswich.

A Chapter on Industrial Stocks.

Although a good deal of nervousness has been experienced during the past week in Industrial stocks, and strong "Bear" attacks were directed against several shares, the tendency has improved somewhat. The war between the United States and Spain is really benefiting this department, as it is evidently inducing investors to place their money into Home securities, instead of going further afield. One of these days, of course, these very same investors will leave Industrials to take care of themselves, but as the end of the conflict is not yet in sight, it is of no use to speculate on that prospect. After recent declines a rally has taken place in Lipton Ordinary to $\frac{15}{16}$ premium, while the Prefs. stand at $\frac{1}{8}$ premium, and the Debentures are quoted 4 to 5 premium. The latest rumour is that Liptons will go in for the wine and spirit business in some prominent form. The latest development is the somewhat doubtful rumour that Gilbey's will add a tea branch to their business. In the meantime, Liptons and Mazzawattee Tea are running very close in the matter of payment of big cheques for tea duty. At present the Mazzawattee Tea Company appears to be in the ascendant with regard to this. Welsbach Incandescent Gas shares have not given rise to much business during the week, and the Ordinary have dropped to 102, the Preferred to 92, the Deferred to 18s., notwithstanding the successful exhibition of the new burner. Coats' shares have been bought for Glasgow, and are firmer at 57 x.d. Threads (English Sewing Cottons) are slightly higher at $\frac{1}{2}$-$\frac{9}{16}$ premium. Salt Union Prefs. are firmer at 6, on the hope that the new directorate may succeed in pulling the concern round. Allsopp Ordinary have been weaker at 144, but other home brewery stocks have been a steady market. Guinness Five per Cent. Debenture stock has been dealt in as high as $118\frac{3}{4}$ x.d., while the Ordinary are quoted 570, and Lion Brewery have improved to 50. Warrants for the Preference dividend of J. & J. Yardley & Co., at the rate of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum for the period ended January 30, have been posted, and these prefs. are now quoted ex the dividend, which has been promptly recovered. Millars' Karri shares are slightly firmer at $3\frac{1}{8}$, but the promised new Australian timber companies have not yet made their appearance. Hudson's Bay shares are only slightly better at $20\frac{1}{2}$, and there is little prospect of any immediate rally. Electric Light shares have been in some demand, more especially City of London Electric, which are higher at $26\frac{1}{2}$, and there has also been an improvement in Metropolitan and Charing Cross. Lyons' shares have been steady at $4\frac{1}{8}$, but people are somewhat anxious to learn whether the promised new developments will come off. Of new Companies on the board there is, in the first instance, Vinolia, Limited; and a contemporary is responsible for the statement that another proprietary medicine, which has been well advertised during the past eight months, and originated, like most others, in the States, is to be floated into a company. Then there is being made another issue of Preference shares of Furness, Withy, & Co. The report of the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company is looked forward to with much interest, especially as the price of the Deferred has now fallen to 6s. 6d., while the Ordinary stand at 13s. 6d. Humbers have remained dull at 12s. 3d. for the Ordinary and 7s. for the Extensions, while Cycle Components are unaltered at $1\frac{1}{4}$. In Swifts hardly any business is passing at 12s., and Singers have again declined to 10s. 3d., while Amalgamated Tyres are nominally quoted 5s. It is difficult to account for the weakness of the Cycle share market, except that most of the big men connected with it have through unsuccessful speculations been relegated to the category of "lame ducks." The shares in some of the respectable concerns would certainly be worth picking up, if it were not for that circumstance. John Barker & Co., Limited, have done an excellent business in 1897, and have fully borne out the remarks which I made in the earlier history of the Company. Dividends of not less than 11 per cent. have always been paid, and during the last two years $13\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. was paid on the Ordinary shares. The price of these shares is now $2\frac{3}{4}$ x.d. The fall in Hotel Cecil Prefs. to $3\frac{1}{4}$ is not at all surprising, in view of the passing of the Preference dividend, as soon as ever the vendors were quit of their obligation. The management of the Hotel has evidently left a good deal to be desired. The report of Schweppes, Limited, is not a very encouraging document, and, after payment of the Preference and Ordinary dividends, a distribution at the rate of 2 per cent. only was left for the Deferred shares, viz., £3,947, the amount carried forward being £1,616. The question is asked why Schweppe Ordinary shares stand at $1\frac{1}{8}$, and Bovril Ordinary at $\frac{15}{16}$ only, although the Bovril Deferred Dividend was 5 per cent. as against 2 per cent. on Schweppe Deferred. I dare say this is, to a great extent, a question of future competition, and I should not like to decide whether Bovril or Schweppe will have more competitors. Palace Theatre shares have been run up from 20s. to 25s., and there are rumours of a good dividend coming. It was also reported that a strong American Syndicate has made a substantial bid for the building. This, however, so far is only talk. Russian Petroleum and Schibaieff have been steady, but suffered a little from the general fall. The Preference shares of these concerns seem quite neglected, but may deserve some attention. Fish oils, however, have now declined to 5 to $5\frac{1}{4}$. Amongst the new enterprises which will shortly be issued is the Volanite Company, which will have a capital of £80,000, and will be offered to the shareholders of the Fish Oil Company. Volanite is an article lately discovered by Mr. F. Lamplough, C.E., and which is apparently to be used for making railway-sleepers and other wooden appliances imperishable.
—Your affectionate uncle, MOSES.

P.S., Tuesday Morning—The Spanish defeat at Manila proves to have been so crushing that it must exercise a considerable influence upon the duration of the Spanish-American War. People are beginning to say that if the same state of unpreparedness exists in other sections of the Spanish army and navy, the whole fabric will crumble to pieces on the next serious attack by the Yankee forces. Wall-street has put up prices hand over fist during yesterday's Stock Exchange holiday here, and London is following suit, Milwaukee opening at $94\frac{1}{4}$, Louisville at 52, Union Pacific Common at $21\frac{1}{2}$, &c. The view that the conflict will terminate at an early date is, moreover, beginning to prevail on the Stock Exchange, and all the markets this morning were buoyant. The South African department opened very strong, with Rand Mines at $29\frac{7}{8}$, East Rands at $4\frac{7}{16}$-$\frac{1}{2}$, Consolidated Goldfields of South Africa at $4\frac{1}{4}$, and De Beers at $26\frac{3}{4}$. Home Rails were firmer, and even West Australians shared in the improvement, Lake View Consols rising to $8\frac{7}{16}$ x.d. Spanish were quoted lower at $32\frac{1}{2}$ "ex the fleet," as the jobbers humorously put it.

QUEER STORY.

THE THEFT OF A SECRET TREATY.

[This story has been communicated to me by a well-known politician, who, in his youth, was for some time a junior clerk in the F.O.—Ed. TRUTH.]

IT is not, I believe, known to more than two or three people, that a good many years ago, there occurred a sort of miniature Dreyfus affair in one of our own Government offices in Downing-street. And when I use the phrase, "Dreyfus affair," in reference to the occurrence, I must be careful to explain myself, lest I should convey a wrong impression. For the case alluded to only resembles the Dreyfus case in the one particular, that an official person was accused, on strong circumstantial evidence, of communicating an important Government secret to a foreign Power. With this general feature, in fact, all similarity between the two cases begins and ends.

Stay! There is one other point of resemblance to the Dreyfus case, which, for the moment, I had overlooked. It has been alleged that an affair of the heart had some intimate connection with the unhappy Hebrew's treachery, and that he might even now be holding his commission in the French Army if it had not been for a woman. Well; there was a woman in this Downing-street case—a young woman—a very charming maiden. And she was the only daughter of a Cabinet Minister. I may as well state, at once, without more ado, that I myself am the man against whom the accusation was brought. I then occupied the post of private secretary to the Right Hon. the Earl of Blank, at that time Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It was in the exercise of this capacity that I made the acquaintance of my chief's only daughter, Lady Helen Dashleigh, a very pretty and charming girl of scarcely twenty summers. I myself was only twenty-six. My own personal attractions were not inconsiderable. I had a susceptible heart. What more natural than that I should fall in love with this delicious damsel? What more natural—after all these years I can put the question, I think, without immodesty—that she should reciprocate my sentiments? At any rate, she did reciprocate them. We bound ourselves by a secret engagement.

And the reason we kept the engagement secret was this; that, well born and well connected as I am, I had at that time very little money—to wit, a paltry income of but £800 a year; and we knew that Helen's father, though an immensely rich man, who could have endowed us with £10,000 a year and not have missed it, would have set his face ruthlessly against her engagement to impecunious me, and have sent me about my business at a day's notice, had he been aware of the truth.

But these little secrets have an unfortunate habit of leaking out, and before I had been engaged to his daughter six months my Right Honourable employer happened to discover our engagement. He was greatly incensed, and having rated me, in no measured terms, for my dishonourable conduct, and having ridiculed my absurd pretensions, as he was pleased to call them, with extreme virulence, he forbade me his private house from that time forward I was neither to communicate with, nor make any attempt to see, Helen, and if he discovered me doing so, he would dismiss me from his employment altogether. As such a result would have seriously impaired, if not ruined, my prospects in life, I could not afford to take the bold line and defy him. So, without giving any promise—indeed, in the excitement of his wrath he did not ask me for any—I appeared to acquiesce in the conditions imposed. I had a shrewd suspicion, indeed, that but for the fact that I was an excellent linguist (my mother having passed much of her girlhood on the Continent, and speaking French, German, and Italian with equal fluency—a faculty which she had transmitted to me), my chief would have dismissed me altogether, as it was. But my powers in this direction were of great use to the Right Honourable gentleman, who was himself a linguist of very limited capacity; and more for that reason, I believe, than because he had any desire to be lenient, I was permitted to retain my seat in his private room at the Foreign Office.

I have not yet described Helen's father, and I think I must spend a few sentences in doing so. He was an elderly gentleman, short and pudgy, with a fat, solemn face, and a bald pate. Although he was a tenth earl and a fourteenth baron in the direct line, his best friends could not have called his appearance aristocratic. Had you met him in the street without knowing him, you would probably have set him down as a respectable shop-keeper. And, in fact, respectability (if I may be permitted a musical metaphor) was the sonata of his character. Everything about him was respectable, from his abilities downwards. But if you had expected brilliancy, originality, or statesmanship from this worthy earl, you might have expected till doomsday. Perhaps it was to the absence of these qualities, as much as to his high rank and his vast territorial influence, that he owed his position as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; for the then Prime Minister was notoriously a man of the old Whig school of non-intervention in European politics; and certainly he could not have delegated the management of Foreign Affairs to any Minister who was more certain to tread the cautious path of Whig traditions, and less likely to embroil this country in a dispute with any Continental Power.

The disrespectful juniors at the Foreign Office were wont to dub him an old wife. With them he was not popular, being uncommonly fussy and meddlesome, and in the habit of poking his nose into all sorts of matters of the most trivial detail. He was a man who carried method in trifles to the verge of a mania; and I used to notice, with much inward amusement, into what a state of irritation it put him if, for instance, any one of the articles on his writing table had been moved an inch from its proper position. There they always stood (except when the caretaker had been rashly officious in her dusting, for which she got finely jobated, I promise you)—the inkstand exactly in the centre; the paste-pot five and a half inches to the right; the sealing-wax tray precisely equidistant on the left; and everything else upon the table on its own particular spot, from which it could not be shifted a hair's breadth but the methodical Minister would notice it. There was one thing more—a living thing—which had its own especial place on the Earl's table, where it lay curled up nearly all day, and added not a little to the old-wifely character of his surroundings. This was a favourite black cat named Pesarsi* (I never saw the name written, so have spelt it phonetically), which slumbered peacefully enough when left to itself, but if stirred up with a penholder or a stick of sealing-wax (instruments wherewith I and other juniors occasionally prodded it, in the Earl's absence), was one of the wickedest devils to swear and bite and scratch that I ever saw.

But to give an idea of how fussy and old-womanly the Earl was in other things also, I may mention a certain little personal matter, in which this quality of my chief's was very absurdly exemplified. I have said above that my mother had passed much of her girlhood on the Continent. The consequence was she numbered many foreigners among her friends. And it so happened that the son of almost her most intimate friend, a Parisian, was then attached to the French Embassy in London. Naturally we showed him as much hospitality as we could; and he, being a very decent and companionable young fellow, soon became quite a pal of mine, and we often went out together to functions, theatres, and various places of amusement. This very innocent circumstance, coming to the knowledge of my cautious chief, exercised him greatly. And if you'll believe me, he took me to task, with great seriousness, for my intimacy with the young French attaché

"Consider," he said, with a grave frown on his solemn face, "how undesirable it is that a young man in your position should be constantly seen about with a member of the French Embassy."

* I have been informed by a member of my staff (who, however, is as ignorant as my contributor about the proper spelling of the name) that Pesarsi is the Tamil for Satan, and is the common designation for black cats in Ceylon. I find on reference to Colonial records that the Earl of Blank, the Minister evidently here referred to, was for some years Governor of that island; which no doubt accounts for his having selected this rather shocking name for his feline favourite.—[Ed. TRUTH.]

"Do you suspect me, my lord, of communicating official secrets to him?" I could not help inquiring, at the same time choking down a strong disposition to laugh.

"Tut, tut! Of course I suspect nothing of the kind. But others may take a different view. And think how bad it looks."

"I should have thought, my lord," I said, "that I was too insignificant a person for my friendships to attract any notice."

"Your modesty does you credit," answered the Earl, with ponderous sarcasm. "All the same, I am not in the habit of arguing with my juniors, sir. And I would strongly recommend you to take this hint, which I have given you as a friend, before I find it necessary to expostulate with you in another capacity."

When my chief took that line with me, of course I had no option but to promise compliance with his wishes, absurd as they were. However, all that I did in the way of carrying my promise out was merely to shun the Frenchman's company in those places where there was a likelihood of meeting the Earl. In reality, we remained just as intimate as we had been before.

It was not long ere I discovered a special reason for my chief's anxiety that I should discontinue my intimacy with the French attaché. I made the discovery by piecing together various little scraps of information that came under my notice, whereby I was able to infer with tolerable certainty, that the Earl was negotiating a secret treaty with the Prussian Government—not altogether to the advantage of France. And doubtless he was afraid lest, in the event of my getting to know about this, I might incautiously let drop some remark in the hearing of the Frenchman which would give away this important State secret. For I am sure he did not then suspect me of any intentional treachery.

And now—having done with these necessary descriptions—I will revert to that more interesting matter, my affair of the heart with Lady Helen. I think I have said already that, while appearing to acquiesce in my chief's conditions that I should neither see nor hold communication with his daughter, I had distinctly given him no promise on the subject; and I did not feel myself bound to abstain from doing either, if I could see my chance—without risk of discovery. As to stolen interviews, indeed, these soon showed themselves to be outside the range of possibility, for Helen had been relegated to the charge of the most wideawake old lynx of a chaperon that ever frustrated the dodges of a detrimental. But written communications were easier to negotiate; and the venal compliance of a certain maid-servant in the Earl's household enabled us lovers to carry on a sweet and comforting correspondence.

One afternoon — a memorable afternoon — my chief having gone to attend a Cabinet Council, and I myself having nothing particular to do until he came back, yet being unable to leave the office because the hour of his return was uncertain, I took the opportunity to pen a long and loving letter to Helen. Before I had finished, I heard the Earl's ponderous step in the passage outside, and only just had time to thrust my letter between the sheets of my blotting-pad before he entered. He carried with him a large bundle of papers, which, as he informed me, required immediate attention; and in working upon which I was kept busy for three or four hours. I was not particularly well pleased at this; for, as it happened, I had an appointment with my friend, the Frenchman, to dine with him that evening at 7.30, and afterwards proceed to the Alhambra. But I put my shoulder to the wheel, and working as hard and as rapidly as I could, I had my task completed in time to hurry away from the Foreign Office shortly after seven o'clock.

We dined—the Frenchman and I—cosily at my club, a little later than the hour fixed. And then we chartered a cab to drive us to Leicester-square. It was not until we were half-way there that a certain recollection suddenly flashed across my mind. I had left that unfinished letter to Helen in my blotting-pad at the Foreign Office! Was it safe to let it remain there till next morning? Probably it was. Yet somehow (more for Helen's sake than my own) I did not like to run the risk. And almost in an instant I had made up my mind that I had better proceed to Downing-street at once and gain possession of it. A word or two of explanation to my friend; a shout through the trap-door to cabby; and we were soon in full career for Downing-street.

When we reached the Foreign Office, I jumped out of the cab, rang the bell, which was answered by the custodian, to whom I explained that I had come to fetch some papers. Of course, he let me in without demur, and I hastened at once to my chief's room, which, at this hour, had only one occupant—the inevitable Pesarsi, who lay curled up and slumbering peacefully in his usual place on the Earl's table. As I passed him, on my way out, having duly possessed myself of my letter, the spirit moved me to prod him in the ribs with the ferule of my umbrella—a proceeding which caused him to spring up and spit and swear and rampage with his usual ferocity. The incident was trivial enough. But I record it because, as is often the way with trivial incidents, it had an important bearing on subsequent events.

We spent a pleasant evening at the Alhambra; and, proceeding homewards, reached my rooms about midnight. I invited my friend to come in and have a brandy and soda; but he declined, being tired, he said, and quite ready for his downy. So I bade him good-night, and let myself in with my latch-key, alone. I entered my room, whistling an air from the music of the ballet we had just witnessed; but suddenly I left off and gave a violent start of surprise. Which, considering the circumstances, was hardly to be wondered at. For that an insignificant youngster, like myself, should return home at midnight to find two Cabinet Ministers in his rooms, awaiting him, was (to say the least of it) an unprecedented and extraordinary occurrence. Yet this was what actually confronted me on that never-to-be-forgotten occasion. Side by side, with their backs to the fire, both regarding me, as I entered, with looks of portentous and awful gravity, stood the Prime Minister of England and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Yes, this is the solemn fact. There these two great men were, standing shoulder to shoulder upon my humble hearthrug!

I have no space—I wish I had—to describe to you in detail all that happened at this amazing interview. Suffice it to say that, no sooner had I entered the room than I was instantly set upon and attacked, in most scathing terms, by my chief, the Earl. He had discovered my treacherous theft of that important draft from his table! What theft? What draft? Ah, I knew very well, villain that I was. What had taken me to the Foreign Office at nine o'clock that night? Why had I been accompanied by that scoundrel of a French spy? Yes, I needn't pretend innocence. The caretaker had told him everything. Perhaps I hadn't disturbed Persarsi—who was slumbering on the draft, by pulling it from under him—and made him spit and swear loud enough to be heard all over the building. And if that wasn't enough to make me own my guilt, how came it that the cat, who was always quiet enough, except when rudely aroused, had overturned a pen tray and upset the contents of the paste pot all over the table, as the result of my visit? Oh, yes! He saw my game. I meant to let my French friend copy this draft, and then to replace it early next day, so that the theft should remain undiscovered. But, fortunately, he, himself, had had occasion to go to Downing-street soon after I had left; and so my treachery was exposed.

It was so grave a matter that he had felt compelled to consult his chief, the Prime Minister, at once. And it was by the latter's suggestion that they were both here. Now, then—what had I done with that paper? Had I got it on my person? No? Pshaw! What was the value of a traitor's denial? Would I prove that I had not got it about me by turning out the contents of my pockets before them, then and there?

Conscious of complete innocence, I said, "Yes!" unhesitatingly, and at once suited the action to the word.

But I had forgotten, at the moment, my unfinished letter to Helen, which was in my breast pocket with my other papers. And only when I had thrown them out in a heap upon the table, did I remember it. But it was then too late. The letter fell upon the top of the heap, and the Earl had it in his hand and was reading it before I could interpose.

His face grew darker and angrier than ever as he perused it. At last he broke out:

"This—this—explains everything It—it—supplies the last damning link in the chain of evidence against you, you scoundrel. See!" he cried, excitedly, turning to the Prime Minister, and pointing his finger to a passage in my letter. "Listen to this. Hear what this fellow, who calls himself a gentleman, has written clandestinely to my daughter:—'My own, I will make money quickly—somehow, so that we can marry whether your father consents or not.' What do you make of that? Do we need any further evidence against this fellow? Had we not better hand him over to the police at once?"

"It is, indeed, a black case," replied the Prime Minister, shaking his head gravely.

The Earl, in his wrath and excitement, began to pace up and down the room; and, as his manner was, when so doing, he gathered the flowing tails of his frock coat, one over either arm. It was to this circumstance that the sudden and speedy termination of this little affair was due, and that my escape from spending the night in a police cell must be ascribed. For as, in his perambulations, my chief turned his back upon us, striding towards the window, there in the—the—space between his coat tails, a very striking and extraordinary object loomed obtrusively visible.

I stared. The Prime Minister stared; fixing his eye-glass in his left eye, and puckering his ample forehead into a frown of perplexed astonishment.

"Hem! Excuse me, Blank," coughed the Right Honourable gentleman. "Hem—do you—are you—may I ask, in the habit of walking about with a folio of foolscap attached to your—hem—inexpressibles?"

"Eh? What? What do you mean?" cried the Earl.

For reply, the Prime Minister took two paces forward, and plucked the sheet of paper with his forefinger and thumb. It was not easily dislodged; in fact, it offered some considerable resistance; and when it came away, quite a considerable fragment was still left adhering to the Foreign Secretary's trousers.

"H'-m! This is very adhesive foolscap," said the Prime Minister. "It—it seems to have been gummed. Ha! There goes! I was afraid I should tear it. Some one has been playing a trick upon you, Blank. . . . Why, damn it, if this isn't the—the——"

"The what?" cried my chief, snatching the torn fragment from his grasp, and anxiously scanning it. "By Jehoshaphat! You are right. It is indeed the—the——"

At that point I burst into a roar of laughter, which I could not restrain. I saw exactly what had happened. When I prodded Pesarsi with my umbrella, that rampageous Tom had upset the paste-pot on to the draft, and in his further scrambles, had caused the foolscap to flutter from the table into the Ministerial chair. Further, I could picture to myself the Foreign Secretary coming in, and lifting his coat tails with his usual pompous deliberation, and finally depositing himself, with complacent unconsciousness, atop of the paste-bespattered paper.

* * * * *

The following is all the material part of an interview which subsequently took place between myself and the Earl.

"Ha! ha! ha! You'll excuse my laughing, my lord; but the whole thing has been so unspeakably funny that——"

"Ha! ha! So it has. Splendid joke—splendid," said my chief, putting the best face he could on the matter, and laughing like a man who laughs with the tooth-ache.

"It would make glorious copy for the papers," I remarked.

"Eh? What? This must never get into the papers. I—I—but I can rely upon your discretion," replied the Earl, pretending confidence. But he had turned pale at my words, and was eyeing me with nervous anxiety, all the same.

"To be frank, my lord," I retorted, looking him full in the face, "you have not treated me so well in this affair that I feel under any obligation of silence; but," I added, with unmistakable meaning, "you can lay me under an obligation that will tie my tongue effectually. That is the price of my silence. What do you say?"

He said much—storming, expostulating, appealing. But I stuck to my point and gained it. Next afternoon, in the broad light of day, I walked up to the front door of the Earl's residence; rang the bell, boldly; and was admitted, unquestioned, by an obsequious butler into the presence of the Lady Helen.

ART NOTES.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY—FIRST ARTICLE.

I HAD a curious dream the night before the Academy opened. I found myself an unnoticed spectator in the Council Chamber at Burlington House, surrounded by a comprehensive gathering of R.A.s and Associates. They had apparently been in session some time, for there were visible signs of great excitement in the meeting, and loud cheering called my attention to the fact that a veteran Academician had stepped into the rostrum and was about "to take the word," as the French say. "Mr. Sidney Cooper!" exclaimed the President with a rap of his chairman's gavel, and the artist thus announced proceeded to speak as follows:—"Dear Brethren and Associates," he began, "I, too, like my excellent friend and comrade, Mr. Hook, who has just addressed you, have decided that the time for self-renunciation has come. My pictures have been hung upon the line for more years than I care to remember. My sheep and my cows, grouped in every possible position in the meadows along the bank of my beloved Stour, have become as familiar to the public as the allegories of Mr. Watts. Season after season have I been sated with praise; the crinkly wooliness of my Southdown ewes and the dappled sleekness of my immaculate oxen have been repeatedly acknowledged. Why, then, should I pine for further panegyric? The artist who has painted, in all, say, 21,000 sheep of the same pattern may well rest and be thankful. Henceforward, then, I voluntarily resign my places upon the line to younger and as yet unknown exhibitors. I will take my flocks and herds higher up the mountain side. In more prosaic language, I will be content to have my pictures 'skied.'"

Scarcely had the loud applause called forth by this unselfish declaration come to an end when I saw in my dream that Mr. Peter Graham, R.A., was occupying the place just vacated by the last speaker. "Brother Sidney Cooper is right!" he emphatically exclaimed. "His is a noble example, and I am prepared to follow it. I flatter myself that my shaggy Scotch oxen, bathed in mist and otherwise, have become almost as familiar to visitors to our annual Exhibitions as what I may call the 'Cooperian' cow. My seagulls, too, have now been flying round 'the grass-crowned headlands of a rugged shore' for some years. The time has come when they shall take a higher flight (cheers). My seamew-haunted rocky bastions, 'lashed by the wild and wasteful ocean,' shall henceforth be always located in what—to employ an allowable pleasantry—I may call the Isle of 'Sky' (laughter). Mr. President and Gentlemen, I beg formally to place such part of the line as I have a right to occupy at the disposal of the meritorious outsider" (loud applause). By this time the excitement of the assembly had considerably increased, and it seemed to me in my vision that several Academicians rushed simultaneously to the rostrum and eagerly combated for its possession. It was, indeed, somewhat difficult for me to identify all who took part in the mêlée, but I distinctly remember seeing the faces of Mr. Marcus Stone, Mr. MacWhirter, Mr. Sant, Mr. Wells, and Mr. Benjamin Williams Leader. The last-named had, in fact, almost secured the coign of vantage from which to address the meeting, when there were loud shouts of "Herkomer! Herkomer!" and I saw in my dream that the Bushey Professor, by a determined flank movement, had carried the rostrum. "You may wonder, comrades," he shouted, "at seeing me in this position; but the fact is that I, like those of our brethren who have already spoken, am prepared to take my pictures and 'go up higher.' The paintings I exhibit are, as you know, fine and large. I flatter myself that the life-size Bavarian Parish Council in session which I exhibited two seasons ago, established a record. My board-room portraits have achieved a wide reputation in company-promoting circles. In short, I have drained the cup of praise to its dregs. Moreover, my severest critics would not call me a subtle painter. I underline the points I make with a directness that 'the way-faring man, though a fool' cannot well fail to see. Why, then, should I object to go aloft, like the Thomas Bowling of your nautical ballad? I love the free, pure air of the mountain top. Therefore, I, too, am willing, nay, eager, to be 'skied.' Besides, I not only maintain a large annual output of pictures, I also manufacture young artists by the score. I will help make room for them upon 'the line.' It is but just that Bavaria should give place to Bushey!"

As the Professor struggled back to his seat the excitement of the meeting culminated. Every one present appeared to be inspired by the same enthusiasm for self-effacement. Associates vied with Royal Academicians in shouts of "Sky me!" "I renounce my rights!" "Give the outsider a chance!" and other such self-renunciatory expressions. It was a field day of altruism, a very saturnalia of self-denial. Artists but lately admitted within the Academic circle clamoured for their pictures to be hung as high as Haman. Mr. Solomon J. Solomon positively hustled Mr. Hacker in his rush for the rostrum, and I heard Mr. Orchardson assuring Mr. Stanhope Forbes in a loud voice that he had really grown weary of being called the Incomparable, and that he would gladly take refuge in higher altitudes where he could not be pelted quite so freely with commendatory adjectives. But this, I believe, was the last coherent remark which reached me, for the President now wholly failed in securing even the semblance of order; and as a consequence not one word of what Messrs. Ouless and Crofts were simultaneously shouting could I understand. I distinctly saw Sir Edward Poynter, however, making minatory passes with his hammer, and his last despairing "rap, rap," merged curiously enough into the knocking of the servant at my chamber door and the announcement of my shaving water.

"Then I knew that I'd been dreaming," as the song puts it, and any lingering doubts I may have had on the subject were entirely dispersed when, a few hours later, I entered Burlington House and made the usual preliminary canter through the galleries. It was the same old Academy. There was no sign of the rearrangement of pictures foreshadowed in my dream. The same old repetitions, the same old imbecilities, the same old fatuities, the same old absurdities, occupied the places in which we have grown accustomed to look for them. But here and there, fortunately, amongst the fourteen hundred pictures on the walls, one came on works of real merit—plums in a pudding of mediocrity, prizes in a wilderness of blanks. These compensatory pictures are not very numerous, perhaps, but they occur with sufficient frequency to lead one on through the eleven galleries.

Yes, there are canvases in front of which one may rest and take fresh courage for the onward journey. But all this time I well know I am only fencing with the question which every art critic is expected to answer each recurring May. Sooner or later in this article it is imperative that I should stand and deliver my opinion of this year's Academy. So let me accept the inevitable and get it over as quickly as possible. My opinion of this exhibition, then, is that it is a fairly good one, quite up to the average of recent years. That it will be a very popular one I do not for a moment suppose. Of the pictures which tell stories such as the public love there are exceptionally few. It is, in fact, interesting to notice how our younger artists are straying from the fixed ways of British art. Be it for good or be it for evil, they are certainly repudiating the influences which are supposed to be paramount at Burlington House, and seem to be inclining more and more to the manner and methods of alien masters. The distinctive British note is now rarely struck, and an examination of the canvases of the artists of the younger generation serves to emphasise the fact that the British School has now virtually no scholars.

It is not difficult to name the picture which will be the most popular of the season. In that sense it will undoubtedly be "Herkomer's Year." His Jubilee picture in the Great Gallery will always be surrounded by the greatest crowd. As every one by this time knows, he has painted the group of Crimean veterans who were drawn up at the foot of the Guards' Monument in Waterloo-place as the Queen went by on her way to St. Paul's. Of the procession there is no palpable evidence in the picture, but as you look at the old soldiers cheering and waving their caps you know that the Queen is passing. Of course the painter of "The Last Muster" has found no difficulty in depicting the group of veterans. Every one of their faces is a portrait, painted with that literal truth which Professor Herkomer usually employs. But the pathos of the scene is of the obvious order, the sentiment is cruder even than the colour, and it seems to me that the thoughtful observer will be struck more by the subtle points which the artist has missed than by the superficial opportunities he has turned to such effective account.

In the first room the visitor will certainly make a halt in front of "The Temptation in the Wilderness," by Mr. Briton Riviere (No. 22). It is the most impressive work this veteran Academician has painted for years and narrowly escapes being a great picture. The members of most Hanging Committees are fond of their little jokes, we know, and this year it has seemed good to these merry gentlemen to sandwich Mr. Riviere's picture between portraits of a gentleman in a fur coat and of one of her Majesty's counsel learned in the law. But even this environment cannot take away the pathos of the divine figure sitting, clad in white, on that waste of stony tableland, as the setting sun paints the horizon in orange and red. There is, unfortunately, one false note in the picture. The fox stealing craftily away on the left is a mistake. Nearly opposite Mr. Briton Riviere's picture is a delightful painting by Mr. J. W. Waterhouse, "Flora and the Zephyrs" (No. 64). It is a feast of sweet and harmonious colours. Never has the story of this breezy courtship been painted with more delicacy and refinement, with more gracefulness and charm. To pass Mr. Edwin A. Abbey's large Shakesperian painting, founded on the first scene of "King Lear" (No. 138), is well-nigh impossible. It calls aloud to you from the wall in the over-opulence of its rich colouring. It has been ambitiously designed; its accessories have been studied with elaborate care; it has been painted with evident pains; but yet it fails to convince, to charm, to satisfy. It smells of the studio lamp, it seems to want the glare of the footlights to properly show off its masses of positive colour. When looking at it I found myself thinking that, after all, Cordelia was only Miss Ellen Terry dressed up, and that the decrepit Lear and his attendants were in reality Sir Henry Irving making an effective exit with a number of well-trained supers. It will be noticed that there has been a new system of hanging the pictures in the Great Gallery. The full-length portraits recur at intervals to the great enhancement of the decorative effect of the room as a whole. Of the really great pictures of the year, not one is to be found in the Great Gallery. The President and Mr. Alma Tadema are represented, but only by conscientious repetitions of subjects they have painted equally well many times before.

It is in Room No. IV. that one experiences the most pleasant surprise. There are to be found at least four pictures of the very highest merit. There, for example, is Mr. Orchardson's great portrait of the ex-Speaker, Viscount Peel. There is only one adjective that can be fittingly applied to this masterful piece of portraiture—it is superb. There is only one other portrait in the Academy worthy to be named in the same breath with it—Mr. John Sargent's "Mr. Asher Wertheimer," of which I shall have more to say when I come to Gallery No. VIII. The two may fairly be bracketed as the portraits of the year. In Room No. IV. is to be seen the "Love Triumphant" of Mr. Watts (No. 310), a really marvellous tour de force for so aged a painter. It would be easy to find faults in it. The titanic figures lying prone on the bare ground are far from right anatomically. Time's shoulder looks hopelessly out of drawing, and Love's legs are at best imperfectly realised, but there is something unspeakably noble in the conception of the winged figure rising triumphantly from the earth it is spurning. This picture, with all its imperfections, seems to tower head and shoulders amongst the other figure-subjects which one finds at Burlington House. Another picture of rare merit is Mr. John M. Swan's "Fortune and the Boy" (No. 331). It is a small picture, and may easily be overlooked amongst its commonplace, flash, and it must, alas, be said, often paltry surroundings, but to pass it unnoticed is to miss one of the most charming imaginative pictures of the year. By the side of the enchanted fountain in which he has just bathed, a graceful boy has flung himself down in the lush grass to build castles in the air and dream those day dreams which only come at the magic touch of youth. As he gazes abstractedly before him, the opalescent mist rising from the fountain shapes itself into a fair and pleasant figure of Fortune, which looks on him with smiling face. The delicacy, the reticence, the charming fancy shown in painting this delightful little masterpiece cannot easily be overpraised. A picture of an entirely different character but of equally marked merit is Mr. Byam Shaw's "Truth" (No. 342). I have on former occasions had to qualify my praise of this artist's work. But this year it is pleasant to be able to congratulate him unreservedly on a really brilliant and humorous work of imagination. That the picture is not more favourably hung is much to be regretted; that it will, notwithstanding this, achieve a wide popularity may be safely predicted. The "Truth" he has depicted with such genuine humour, with such playful satire, with such a blazing splendour of colour, has fallen upon evil times. She has been captured and brought to court, and the artist shows us the steps that are being taken to adapt her to continued residence in her new milieu. The wicked old king has himself undertaken the task of blindfolding her eyes; her wrists have been already secured with silken thongs; an obsequious page is busily engaged in dipping her white robe into a copper bowl of scarlet dye; several merry ladies-in-waiting are bringing up a resplendent velvet mantle to put about her shapely shoulders, whilst the Court Fool—a delightful touch this—is essaying—need I say in vain?—to blow out the tell-tale flame of her magic lamp! It is an allegory not very deep nor subtle, perhaps, but exceedingly effective; and will be remembered, thanks to its saving salt of humour, when much more pretentious canvases of the year are wholly forgotten.

And here, for the present, I must break off, leaving until next week the completion of this discursive ramble through the galleries of Burlington House.

MUSIC.

WAR-MUSIC UP TO DATE.

ALTHOUGH there happily may be no reason to doubt the present popularity of the British in the United States, yet the cablegrams which speak of the enthusiasm with which our National Anthem has been received by popular audiences in New York must be accepted with some reserve. Special correspondents may not be aware that the tune of "God Save the Queen" under the title of "America" (and set to far more sensible words than those of our own "Illiterate National Anthem"), is a National Anthem of the States. It is, perhaps, more to the purpose that popular audiences throughout the Union are receiving with enthusiasm such genuine British Jingo tunes as "The Red, White, and Blue," and "Columbia the Gem of the Ocean," under which title it is not difficult to recognise our old friend of Crimean days, "Britannia the Pride of the Ocean." "Rally round the Flag, Boys" is at the present time one of the most popular tunes of the United States, together with "The Girl I left behind me," "The Star-Spangled Banner," and "Yankee Doodle." "Yankee Doodle," although popularly supposed to be American, is really a British tune, and it is alleged to be derived from the melody "The Roundheads and Cavaliers," of the time of Charles II. Also in another form it is said to be identical with "Kitty Fisher's Jig," and in another, "Lucy Locket Lost her Pocket." Its American history dates from 1775, when Abercrombie's army lay encamped on the east bank of the Hudson, and the raw American levies aroused the derision of the British troops. The music of the "Star Spangled Banner" is English, although it does not date back further than 1812, the American words being written by Francis Scott Key, who died in 1846. Perhaps the best and most American of Transatlantic National Anthems is "Hail Columbia," written by Judge Hopkinson in 1798 to the melody of "The President's March." The Spanish war has brought forward a large number of new patriotic songs, such as "Johnny, Get your Gun," "Take Back your Gold," and "Uncle Sam, Why are You Waiting?" At the present time, however, perhaps the most popular patriotic song in the United States is "Dixie," and both words and music are genuinely American.

In the educational department of the advertisement columns of the Stratford Express on the 23rd ultimo appeared the following startler:—

> 3d. per Pianoforte Lesson at Ladies' own House. Careful Teaching. Address ——.

This, I should imagine, is the bottom price for professional work of such a character. I am unaware whether the usual sixty minutes are given for the nimble threepence, but, at any rate, the fee would, I should imagine, hardly pay the price of the shoe leather worn in going to and returning from the task. The figure—half the docker's humble "tanner"—certainly beats the previous record, namely, 6d. per lesson for violin teaching, "including a glass of milk and a bun."

A few years ago a gentleman who knew so little about music that he might almost have been a diploma holder of one of the Limited Liability Examination Colleges, struck out the brilliant idea of giving music lessons (or pretending to do so) during Church time on Sundays. He would give you a fiddle lesson and a glass of Scotch whisky for a shilling. His class had grown to be a large one, when those wretched Excise officers intervened, and the musician's trade was over.

M. Lamoureux will give his final concert at Queen's Hall on Wednesday of this week. Whether he and Mr. Robert Newman will care to further carry on the enterprise remains, of course, to be seen. It is tolerably certain that M. Lamoureux has not succeeded in gaining a clientèle, such, for example, as Mottl and Richter have done; though the fact is beyond question that his performances have a cachet of their own, and, at any rate for delicacy of performance, that they are almost unsurpassed in this country. M. Lamoureux was at his best when he brought his own band over from Paris; but the cost was too great, and the necessity of giving six concerts in a single week necessarily injured the enterprise. Since then M. Lamoureux has been a little unfortunate in having to rely for his novelties mainly on the works of the French composers of the present day, who may be good men at light opera and the drawing-room song, but who certainly are not great composers of symphonic and other classical music.

An extraordinary robbery took place recently on the premises of Messrs. Beare & Son, the well-known violin experts and importers of Rathbone-place. At Easter their premises were visited by the enterprising burglar. The thieves must have been taking lessons at one of our numerous Schools of Music, or, at any rate, they had with them an expert, for they left most of the "shop" violins, and burgled an assortment of valuable instruments, which had been preserved in a glass case. Among them were several specimens by J. B. Vuillaume, worth probably £100 apiece, at any rate for retail, if not for trade purposes. There were also some old Italian models, a yellow violin by Kloz, and one by Perry, of Dublin. These fiddles are all known, and, in fact, bear the firm's number, so that the thieves will in all probability have a good deal of difficulty in disposing of them. Indeed, a stolen violin is almost as troublesome to part with at auction, or otherwise for value, as a picture by an old master. The Beare fiddles have certainly not yet been offered in the trade, or they would have been recognised at once; and in all probability they are uselessly stored somewhere, no doubt to the immense chagrin of the thieves. If the burglars had stolen the ordinary fiddles of commerce, worth perhaps half a guinea apiece, they might have found a ready sale for them.

Sir Frederick Bridge is continuing his excellent Gresham music lectures, which will next week be delivered in the Great Hall of the City of London School on the Victoria Embankment. The Gresham trustees grant an extra £100 a year for the vocal and other musical illustrations to these lectures, but I rather fancy Sir Frederick Bridge does not get much change out of his own salary after he has paid the music bills. His lectures, however, are interesting, not only to the ordinary amateur, who crowds the room at every lecture, but also to the genuine student of music. Next Monday the subjects chosen are "Chopin's Songs;" on Tuesday the Professor will deal with the organ music of the English school; on Wednesday with the "Development of the Oratorio;" and at the last lecture, on Friday, with the marvellous collection of Elizabethan madrigals known as the "Triumph of Oriana." These lectures are free, and only last an hour; so small wonder that they are popular.

The irrepressible Mr. J. H. Mapleson is to the fore again, and for his projected season at the new Olympic Theatre he declares he has purchased two new operas. One of them is the "Manon Lescaut" of Leoncavallo, which has been played at many Continental opera houses. We have already two "Manons," one by M. Massenet, in which Mme. Marie Rose made so charming a representative of Manon, and the other the opera bearing the same title by Puccini which the Carl Rosa troupe gave last year at Covent Garden. The "Andrea Chenier" of Giordano, which was to have been given at Covent Garden a year or two ago is also on Mr. Mapleson's list. He produced this work last year in the United States, and the scenery and dresses are still available.

The police arrangements for the setting down of carriages at Queen's Hall again collapsed at the Mottl Concert last week, and certain of the daily papers had some very strong remarks upon the subject. Towards the end of the week two musical critics were requested to confer with Sir Edward Bradford at Scotland Yard. Whether this is the best method of devising a reform I am not prepared to say. Musical critics constantly attend Queen's Hall, and know perfectly well the defects of the police arrangements, although, whether they are qualified to suggest a remedy may be altogether another matter. If I were on board a ship which foundered, I might reasonably be allowed to grumble, without pretending to be competent to sail the ship in more seamanlike fashion. Mr. Rubinstein, the energetic solicitor to Queen's Hall, also had an interview with the police authorities some time ago, when they were understood to declare that to devise better arrangements was impossible. I, however, prefer to believe that the police have formed too modest an estimate of their capabilities in a very simple matter. They are able at the opera to control two lines of traffic in different directions, and the task ought to be far more easy in so wide a thoroughfare as north Regent-street. One difficulty, perhaps, lies in the fact that, by official stupidity, a great part of the roadway in front of Queen's Hall and St. George's Hall, two largely patronised places of public amusement, is taken up by a cab rank, which might just as well be in Portland-place.

The return of Herr Felix Mottl to Queen's Hall last week was made the occasion of a genuine demonstration. Herr Mottl, who was on Monday appointed Hermann Levi's successor at Munich, the blue ribband of German operatic life, has recently accepted the post of conductor of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" at Covent Garden next month, and the Wagnerites mustered in force to congratulate him. The audience would doubtless have been even larger if the programme had contained a little more of the master's advanced works. The truly Elect turn up their noses at the "Flying Dutchman," of which the Wagner programme last week was mainly composed. Moreover the performance of the "Siegfried Idyll" was certainly not so good as that to which we are accustomed under Richter. The finest performance of the evening was that of the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart. Mozart of recent years has been more or less neglected, and it seems curious that its revival should be left to an avowed adherent of Wagner.

By the way, I learn that there can be no question of Dr. Richter's engagement for the United States next year. Whether the position was offered to him or not, he could not accept it, as he has yet one year to serve at Vienna in order to secure his retiring pension. Afterwards he will be a free man, and, doubtless, will be willing to take his share of the American dollars. The whole situation in the United States is now more or less a matter of doubt. The effect of the war upon public amusements will be carefully watched, for it would be a risky experiment to take over an expensive party with M. Jean de Reszke at its head unless matters were tolerably settled. At the same time, Mme. Melba seems to be doing very well in the Western States, although it is true that she tours with a small troupe, with works of the "Lucia" and "Rigoletto" species. The lady, like a true prima donna, travels in a private car, with a private chef at £10 a week to cook her private chop, a private waiter, a private conductor, and a private porter to move her luggage. The baggage of a great prima donna must not be touched by profane hands.

Mrs. Bloomfield Zeisler, who has now twice appeared, must have proved a disappointment to those who believed she would be a slap-dash player of the modern school Not even this clever pianist was able to make interesting the D Minor concerto of Rubinstein, although at her recital on Saturday she did far better. Why, however, at her recital she should have relied so greatly upon pianoforte transcriptions instead of original pianoforte works is not quite clear, though she plays them with much skill.

There have been a large number of concerts during the week, many of them given by new comers. Among them were Mr. Tew, an American baritone, who needs further study; Mrs. Landon Ronald, who, if I am rightly informed, is a Colonial vocalist who has studied in Germany, and who is an artist of promise; Dr. Pudor, a violoncellist, who began life as a boy in a quartet party with such now eminent performers as M. Johannes Wolff and Mr. Maurice Sons, but who has more recently been principal violoncellist of the Scottish orchestra; Mme. Clara Poole-King, an American vocalist, who needs further experience, and numerous others. Indeed, the noble army of recital-givers are now strongly in evidence, and for the next two months we promise to have quite enough of them.

Professor Niecks, who some few years ago gave us a masterly "Life of Chopin," is now engaged upon a biography of Schumann. The professor, as I understand, has had access to a large number of private memoranda and letters left by Mme. Clara Schumann.

Many people will regret to learn of the death at the early age of thirty-nine of Mr. Burgon, the English baritone, who both in English opera and at concerts, fairly made his mark. Mr. Burgon, who studied under the veteran Manuel Garcia, made his début seventeen years ago at a performance of Bach's Mass in B Minor given by the Bach Choir. He afterwards joined the Carl Rosa troupe, and subsequently the English opera company formed by Mr. D'Oyly Carte to produce Sullivan's "Ivanhoe." Mr. Burgon shared with Mr. Frangcon Davies the part of Cedric the Saxon, in Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Ivanhoe," and he likewise created the parts of Louis XII. in Messager's "La Basoche," the Count de Grieux in the English version of Massenet's "Manon" and the part of Ostap in the late Goring Thomas's opera, "Nadeshda."

I learn that after the run of the new Sullivan and Pinero piece, we may expect at the Savoy a new light opera from the pen of Mr. Ivan Caryll. This gentleman, although better known perhaps by his dances and other works in musical comedy, has already essayed higher things, particularly in an opera entitled "The Lily of Leoville," produced in London some years ago. Sir Arthur Sullivan, by the way, started his own rehearsals of "The Beauty Stone" at the Savoy on Monday. Mr. Passmore, as the Devil in propriâ personâ, has, I learn, a fine part. Also, by the way, the two American recruits, Messrs. Devoll and Isham, are not, after all, débutants. They have already sung in London at concerts under Mr. Cavour's management.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—I should have thought that a gentleman of Dr. Nikola's experience of murder as a fine art would have known better than to condemn a railway-carriage as an unsafe slaughter-house:—

> A railway train has been repeatedly tried, but never with success; you are bound to be discovered sooner or later.

What of the Wandsworth murder, where the artist slew his victim, hid the corpse beneath the seat, and disappeared into trackless space within three minutes? Neither De Quincey nor Dr. Nikola, however, would rank this summary slaughter among artistic murders, which ex vi termini should show design, refinement, and finish. These pre-eminently are the characteristics of Dr. Nikola's latest murder patent described in "The Lust of Hate" (1). This is a hansom cab, whose pneumatic cushions are charged with an asphyxiating gas, and the artist, in the guise of a cabby, has but to lower the glass in front, thus making the interior air-tight, and then, by the pressure of a spring, to free the gas, in order to dispose of his victim almost instantaneously. But how dispose of the corpse? By the pressure of another spring the seat is made to revolve and to drop the body through the cab on to the road. The artist has but to choose a dark night and a deserted street to dispose of the body and disappear like a flash; "ere a man hath power to say 'Behold!' the jaws of darkness have devoured him up." This is an original idea unquestionably, and hardly less original is the idea of making the hero Dr. Nikola's pupil in the art of thus painlessly and irretraceably disposing of your enemy. Those who enjoyed Dr. Nikola's former achievements of this artistic kind will not be much disappointed in "The Lust of Hate." They will also enjoy Mr. Guy Boothby's shorter flights in "Billy Binks, Hero," (2) a collection of stirring stories in the same vein. What strikes you most perhaps in these adventure stories, which carry all before them to-day, is a worship of the Almighty Dollar so aborbing as to drown not conscience only, but all human affection. When, for example, the hero of "The Millionaire of Hornibrook Island," an ideally altruistic adventurer, hears of his father's death, he says:—"I have been expecting this for some time; but it comes upon me as rather a shock." But the shock was a shock of joy to find himself "one of the richest men in the whole scheme of the universe!" By the way, as this phrase will suggest to you, Mr. Guy Boothby's English is at times something terrible. It is the humour of another stirring story, Mr. Burgin's "The Cattle Man" (3), which is terrible. The boy Jecks, who has emetics forced down his throat continually as antidotes against poison, is the most trying attempt at a humorous creation I have ever come across in fiction. Indeed, all the author's jokes—"and many a joke has he"—are trying. When the hungry hero sits down to a good meal, he "forgot that the world was a little out of joint, although his own jaws nearly became so in his efforts to eat slowly and as a gentleman should." When he suggests, after the meal, that he had hoped as an artist "to set the Thames on fire," one of the two heroines—an admirably drawn character, by the way—retorts with a sneer:—

> It would take a good deal to set the Thames on fire in this weather. You might, perhaps, do it with a pile of your own pencils.

As all the sarcasm of the book is of this subtle kind, it is a pity that Mr. Burgin does not eschew humour altogether and stick to his metier—the invention and construction of a stirring story. Very different is the metier of Mr. Henry Harland, who charms, and at times even enchants, you with his wit and humour, and the dainty delicacy and grace of his portraiture, in "Comedies and Errors" (4). It is not so long since that Englishmen were supposed incapable of miniature painting of the exquisite kind for which France and even America was famous; but few Americans or even Frenchmen could put on the stage characters

> Apparelled in more precious habit,
> More moving-delicate and full of life, than those of Mr. Harland's "Comedies and Errors." While Mr. Harland surprises you by his advance in his art, "Z. Z." astonishes you by the well-nigh incredible falling off in power shown by "Cleo the Magnificent" (5). There is really nothing to be said for this maundering pot-boiler, or only what uncle Toby said of the first work composed in his infancy by the learned Lipsius. I cannot honestly say that Miss Adeline Sergeant has surpassed herself in "Miss Betty's Mistake" (6), but it is a very pretty and pure story of a quaint old maid, whose goodness led her into the mistake which breaks her heart. She marries, in admiration rather of his work than of himself, a broken-down novelist, whose first wife was still alive and in an asylum, and the discovery of the bigamy is made by the appearance of this afflicted lady herself upon the scene. "Miss Betty" tends her till she dies, and then follows her to the grave, brought to it by the agony of her shame and of her disillusion. The younger heroine of the story has her happiness apparently wrecked also by the mad lady's escape from the asylum, since—as the lunatic was presumably her mother—she cannot allow the hero to link his lot with hers. He gets engaged to another girl, who jilts him, and is thus set free to marry the heroine, who turns out to have been only the adopted daughter of the mad woman. It is a very pretty story and very pleasantly told. The new edition of Thackeray, in which "Vanity Fair" (7) forms the first volume, is sure of a warm welcome from all admirers of the great novelist. Thackeray was, you know, most anxious that no biography of himself should be written. Without disrespect to his wishes, however, Mrs. Richmond Ritchie has thought herself at liberty to contribute to each volume of this edition a "biographical introduction," containing reminiscences of her father and extracts from his letters and diary. Judging from the first instalment, this series of introductions will be as interesting as any set biography could be, and it certainly adds a unique attraction to what is in all respects a handsome edition of Thackeray. In conclusion, I hope I may be permitted to chronicle the appearance of another book, "A Word to Women" (8), from the pen of a talented colleague of mine. In it Mrs. Humphry discourses brightly, sensibly, and helpfully upon a hundred and one matters of interest to her sex—indeed, to both sexes. The excellent advice she tenders to wives in the chapter on "Our Debts" is alone sufficient to commend the little volume to every husband.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely, DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—The most interesting of our experiences this week was a visit to the Hôtel Cecil to meet the widow of General Tom Thumb, her present husband, Count Magri, his brother, Baron Magri, and Mr. and Mrs. Maible, the Comedy Company of little ladies and gentlemen who are to be one of the attractions at Earl's Court this season. They are a most interesting group of cultivated, amiable, and agreeable men and women, and we very much enjoyed half an hour's conversation with them. We were more annoyed than surprised to see people approach them with grins on their faces and an air of condescending curiosity, which was extremely out of place. With the exception of lack of inches, the members of the party are on a par with most of us and very superior to many. Their good breeding is at once evident, and they converse freely on all the topics of the day. The Contessa Magri deplores the war, as all women must do, and says that American women detest the idea of it. She is delighted with the progress made of late years in the woman movement, and said something that I thought remarkably true, but that had never occurred to me before—viz., that women have more time to think over things than men, because men's work absorbs them and occupies all their thoughts, whereas women's work leaves their thoughts free to scan all that has presented itself for consideration.

We asked her if she liked England, and she said that for some things she liked it very much, and that she certainly prefers the railway travelling here to that in the States, for though the latter is much more comfortable, it is impossible for a party over there to be alone in the cars. Count Magri conversed on politics and the war with Richard, while we talked with the ladies. He is immensely patriotic for his adopted country—his native land by marriage, as it were. He and his brothers are natives of Bologna. The other little lady, Mrs. Maible, is, like all the rest of the party, perfectly well-proportioned. She is very sprightly, and shows her dimples in a bright smile when she talks. She has been married three years to Mr. Maible, the fifth member of the group, who dresses with very great care, and with evident cultivation of the latest fashion in ties, collars, and every other item of the wardrobe. He, too, has a very happy face. They are the gayest and most good-humoured looking couple I have seen for some time. They live with her parents when at home, which is very rarely, for "we are so constantly on the road," she explained, "that it is not worth while to keep house." Their present visit to England is for six months certain. Mrs. Maible is very fond of flowers, so the Englishwomen she meets will have an easy way of showing their appreciation of her.

The little Countess has genuine dignity, and a quiet self-possession of manner. She needs it, for there are many silly persons who speak to her in a foolish way. Fancy, dear, one of the men present at their reception, asked her which of her two husbands she liked the best! Why should people address to her questions and remarks that they would not dream of making to fully grown women? With all our boasted civilisation I fear we are a very uncultured nation.

The piece in which they are to appear at Earl's Court is "Two Strings to Her Bow." I am sure you would like to know the exact height of some of the performers. Countess Magri is 34 inches high, her husband 37 inches, his brother 38½ inches.

It has been a wonderful week of weddings, every one who was bent on matrimony speeding to have the nuptial knot tied before the arrival of May, the unlucky hymeneal month. On Saturday afternoon the Hon. Elaine Guest, daughter of Lord and Lady Wimborne, was married at St. George's to Mr. Ernest Villiers, and the dear old church, which has seen so many happy weddings, looked its very best, the chancel being decorated with palms and hothouse flowers. The singing of the choir has immensely improved, and in the lovely "He, watching over Israel," their voices and training were most agreeably shown. The bride, a very handsome girl, tall and stately, looked serene and fair in her bridal gown. The church was filled with friends, among whom were the Duchess of Roxburghe, in black and white, the Duke and Duchess of Somerset, the Danish Minister and Mme. de Falbe, Lady Galway and her pretty daughter, Lady Erne and a charming daughter, Lady Randolph Churchill, in grey, and Lady Féo Sturt, the prettiest and best-dressed woman there. Lady Ridley also looked charming.

The wedding of Miss Sambourne, daughter of Mr. Linley Sambourne, the well-known artist on Punch, attracted a number of artistic and literary men, with their wives and daughters, to St. Mary Abbot's on Thursday afternoon, and the reception at the Empress Rooms, Palace Hotel. The wedding gifts were displayed in the spacious and beautiful ground-floor room, and the refreshment buffet lined the walls, whose pink panelling proved a most becoming background for the pretty dresses of the guests. I believe there are equally large rooms upstairs. It is at this hotel that the De Reszkes and other celebrated operatic artists always put up, and in fact the De Reszkes are expected there this week.

I am sending you The World of Dress, in the pages of which new periodical you will find all the information you can possibly require upon the important subject. Please note the clinginess of evening dress in the coloured plate. Is not the pink one sweet? A specialty of the publication is a summary of the modes of Paris, New York, and Vienna, with notes of the fashions worn upon the stage in those cities. Fashions for elderly women and for children are not forgotten in this excellent shillingsworth.

I am glad you asked me to go to Redfern's for you, for it gave us the opportunity of seeing the smartest frocks we have seen this season. They have new showrooms open on the first floor for the display of evening and elaborate visiting and reception dresses, and these are of the most chic and up-to-date description. London has seen nothing like them, so far. Fancy a white silk muslin made over pink muslin, the effect ineffably pale and soft. The skirt is trimmed with incrustations of the finest and most transparent Chantilly, arranged in lappet-like panels. These are cut out from piece-lace, each spray being carefully freed from the net so as to stand out clear and well-defined on the tender pink. The bodice is lovely, but I cannot describe it with the hope of conveying any idea of its perfections to your mind. It had revers edged with the black lace and bands of lace down the back, from the shoulders, and a long sash of the lace fell to the hem. I have never seen lace so exquisitely fine and soft. It had quite a filmy look upon the pink silk muslin.

A very handsome grey taffetas reception dress was trimmed tablier-shape with a frill of black chiffon lined with white and headed with a band of guipure, cut out from the piece, and consequently finished at either side with an undulating outline which is much more graceful than the ordinary straight-edged band. On the bodice was a boléro of grey mirror velvet with appliqués of embroidery in willow green, grey, and black, intricately interwoven and highly effective. A band of the green velvet encircled neck and waist, and a cascade of black chiffon and guipure fell from the neck at either side. It is a sweet gown, and essentially a gentlewoman's, smart and chic as it is. A blue gauze race or visiting dress was trimmed en tablier, with rufflings of its own material, edged with a deep frill of blue gauze spotted with white—these round spots are a perfect rage in Paris. The spotted gauze formed the sleeves and front, and there was a deep lace collar.

We saw some of the materials for smart summer gowns, and oh, Amy, dear! they are only too tempting. Some are muslin of the softest and silkiest, embroidered in lightest fashion with deep cream-tinted lines of lace laid on or let in. Shaped skirts are embroidered in openwork, and drawn in with seams close to the figure at the waist and below it. Flowing out at the feet a deep trimming of embroidery appears, with pointed lines running upwards. For evening wear there was a design in black fern leaves—another craze of the moment—on white muslin, the sprays running upwards, so that a stout figure would look quite slight in it. These are all to be made up over silks of any colour. Downstairs among the tailor-mades, which grow smarter and smarter with every season, I fixed my affections on a blue serge with five rows of stitching carried round the skirt and up at the back at regular intervals. The coat was tight-fitting and fastened with the new glass buttons. It can be worn open or shut, in the latter case showing a front of tucked white or cream-coloured satin, the tucks arranged perpendicularly, and each one sewn down with a thin cream-coloured cord. It was a particularly smart gown, though my description may not have enabled you to realise the fact. The collar and cuffs were in Oriental embroidery. The skirt hung so beautifully that it alone would have "made" the dress. A good cut is of more importance than quality of material.

Not that the latter can be ignored, as we noticed in a red cloth gown, the folds of which fell with a gracefulness that cut alone could never have achieved, though it was an important factor in producing the admirable result. The cloth was sumptuously soft and yet of sufficient substance to cling to the figure in the regulation manner, flowing out below the knees in many folds of fulness. The dainty little coat was cut away in front and had large steel buttons on either side. The collar was turned back with cream-coloured satin sewn with beads and otherwise embroidered in a telling way. There were two vests, one of white satin and cream-coloured guipure, and the other of silk muslin, also in a creamy tint, and finished with lace-edged frills. A lovely hat in straw of a lighter shade of red and trimmed with red flowers and quills was shown with this.

With your admiration for grey you would have fallen very deeply in love with a dress in cloth of that colour, the shade being sympathetically pale, not one of the ugly, hard, slate tints that I quite abhor. It is so middle-aged, slate colour! This pretty frock was trimmed at each side of the front with pine-shaped appliqués of the cloth slightly in relief and showing a lining of red—quite a novel trimming. The collar and epaulettes were carried out in the same way, and most effective they were. The fronts were open, and had a lining of quilted red silk bordered with red velvet, the vest between being perpendicularly-tucked white satin. The collar, made of the same, was of the stand-up order. To be worn with this there was a cream-coloured satin straw toque trimmed with gold-sequined lace, white glacé silk, and white wings. A spray of cerise roses was tucked under the brim at the back.

I wish I had time to tell you of a sweet coat and skirt of black cloth, with sac front to the bodice and deep collar of white cloth, all embroidered in clematis and leaves; of a race-coat of cream-coloured cloth with deep velvet collar, the edges shaped out on inward curves; and of a toque in tones of lavender and mauve, with one of the new fern-leaves laid over the flowers, and softening them admirably. But I must haste away to other things.

Do you want to know something about the newest designs in jewellery? What woman does not? We saw some lovely things last week at the Goldsmiths' and Silversmiths' Company 112, Regent-street. It seems that small aigrettes are in greater favour at present than tiaras. A perfectly sweet one was in what's-o'clocks, deftly imitated in diamonds, the stems rising from a true lover's knot, also in diamonds. Seven of the flowers made a graceful group. Another aigrette was formed of two half-opened cornflowers carried out in diamonds. There were many others, all marked with the price in plain figures, as is everything in the establishment. It is such a comfort, when prowling round, to be able to see the price of all the sweet things that engage one's affections without having to ask. We were shown something unique, a set of diamonds, ten in number, each one of which was in a different colour from the rest. They ranged from the purest white to black, grading through straw-colour, yellow, light brown, &c. Opals are as much in favour as ever, and we saw a lovely necklace composed of five specimen opals—that is, selected for their beauty—set in diamond clusters arranged within a series of elliptical loops intertwined with each other. A beautiful diamond necklace can be taken apart to form two bracelets, a pendant, and a brooch. A very costly diamond necklace was in solitaire stones, three rows of them in the front, one at the back. Pearl necklaces and dog-collars were there in profusion and in every variety of design, also jewelled muff-chains, now no longer to be accurately so called, since they are worn purely as ornaments, quite apart from any pretence at muff-holding. They are in gold and enamel without jewels, and others are in pearl and enamel, while the more costly have rondelles of opal and crystal, cabochon ruby, and crystal or diamonds and pearls alternately. Clear-set rubies decorate some of them.

A pair of wings on a comb form a desirable hair ornament, especially as the wings are in fine diamonds. Other combs have Louis XV. designs, also in diamonds. We very much admired a large comb in pierced work with three diamond-shaped interludes let in and filled in with fine network in brilliants.

Do not all these pretty things sound tempting?

You asked me about blouses, so I went to Lee's and applied for answers to all your questions. They have all the new shapes and the latest trimmings, so the information is up to date. The very prettiest are made of printed chiffon to be worn over a separate silk lining in any colour. These are inexpensive, a guinea covering the cost of some of them. The washing muslins are also dainty and fresh-looking. One of the sweetest of the blouses was in rucked black chiffon, with a trimming of turquoise and silver lace so disposed as to simulate a low bodice with the upper part filled in. The long sleeves were in rucked chiffon. White muslin blouses over colour had a tempting appearance, being hand-made and exquisitely finished. And there was one with lace trimmings crossing the front diagonally, and yet another with insertions carried all round, tucks filling in the intervals between them.

The silk petticoats there are made with the new skirt, the fulness rising at the back and serving to throw out the dress skirt effectually. Made of shot silk, with accordioned flounces, they are light as well as smart. Shirts of every description are to be worn, and among the prettiest were some with a trimming of frills curving upwards from the centre in front. They were in the new blue, green, pink, heliotrope, mauve, yellow, and every colour you can think of. They can be made to measure, which is always a great comfort.

I got the two Royal Crescent veils for you, and send them with this. They fit so comfortably on the hat or toque that they are the only ones we ever use. The newest are finely dotted with black on white. They are also made in blue, mauve, grey, and so on, to match the colour of the headgear.

In my last letter I spoke to you of hats at "Mme. Yorke's," Clifford-street. I am now asked to state that the name of the firm is "E. Yorke, Limited," only Mme. Yorke, of Conduit-street, having the right to use that name.

Christabel writes from Paris:—

Varnishing day at the Salon is looked to as setting a certain key-note to the fashions, so I will endeavour to give you an idea of the different styles. Cloth and foulard seemed to predominate. A very charming costume of silver-grey cloth had a plain round skirt and a chemisette of turquoise-blue fleur de velours under a long bolero of the grey cloth, entirely covered with narrow grey braid of the same tint. The bolero had large revers of the blue fleur de velours edged with a frilling of grey chiffon. The hat worn with this had a small crown of blue straw twisted round with blue tulle, and a blue paradise feather, and was raised on one side with a half-wreath of white roses. A young girl looked very well in navy blue foulard with white spots, made with a plain skirt, the foulard bodice covered with a bolero of Irish guipure over a full front of white silk muslin; the sleeves were foulard with epaulettes of Irish guipure, the neck and waistband of white soft silk. The toque matched, consisting of dark blue straw with two blue wings.

"MADGE'S" advice for smart and original Shirts, Blouses, Veils, Hosiery, Gloves, &c., "LEE, of Wigmore-street has no equal."

A black foulard with a white pattern in it was most tastefully made. The bodice had a kind of rounded yoke of Venetian guipure over white satin, with a high neck-band and a ruche of white satin and guipure at the back. Round the foot of the skirt and also below the yoke on the bodice were three rows of white satin ribbon. The hat worn with this was straw-coloured crin, or horse hair, with pale green aigrettes and a half-wreath of variegated roses. Another dress I admired was white silk with a black satin stripe about half-an-inch wide. The skirt was plain, but over the bodice was a smart little cape of black silk muslin, coming round the shoulders and leaving the arms and slim waist quite free; a black capote with pink roses finished this charming costume. A rather curious combination was a heliotrope foulard with small white pattern in front, a tablier of white taffetas with five rows of Chantilly insertion going across it. The bodice was a tight-fitting coat of green cloth with large cut steel buttons; under this a waistcoat of striped mauve and green glacé with smaller steel buttons; the mauve straw hat was loaded with cherries.

There were some rather nice mantles in cashmere, of the same colour as the dress, in what they call the 1840 shape, edged with frills of silk muslin; but these are most suitable for middle-aged people (if there are any such nowadays). Jackets of all makes and descriptions were to be seen, and long boléros, embroidered, braided, and ornamented in every way. What I admire most this season is the pale shade of cloth so much in vogue; not mastic, but more the colour of new leather. This, trimmed with guipure of a creamy tint is exquisite, especially for young girls and young women, but the material must be cloth or cashmere to succeed. Silk does not take the same hue. A plain skirt, with guipure on the bodice, is lovely, either as yoke or revers over white satin, and on the cuffs; and remember, if you are bent on economy, the same material will dye with a darker shade when you are tired of it. I must not forget to add, as the result of my observations in this varied crowd, that blouses seem on the decline. The bodices had still waistbands of different styles, satin, and jewelled; but the backs were all plain and tight, and the fronts, though not fitting closely with seams, and pleats, and darts, were not baggy or pouchy.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

DEAREST MADGE,—Last week little did we heed how the great world was spinning down the ringing grooves of change; it was our National Race Meeting week, Punchestown, in the first place, and Leopardstown, a little way after, claimed our whole attention. We had to go to Punchestown on Tuesday and Wednesday, and to Leopardstown on Friday and Saturday—enough, in all conscience, to occupy an average mind. Of course, we all do not do the four days, but we prepare for and talk of doing them, and do nothing else, so that it comes to much the same thing in the end. And then all of us who are advanced enough to be betting women—no inconsiderable number—faithfully attend every day. A matter of necessity when the object is to "spot winners," for, to judge by Fred, who works on the same lines, the business of spotting winners seems to have a way of getting postponed from day to day; in fact, like hope, it is principally distinguished by the possession of a great future. What an advance our sex have made since the days—not so very long ago—when our wagering was, in a comparatively innocent way, confined to gloves, parasols, &c. Then we advanced to having our men manage a little business for us with the bookmakers, and behold us now—so easy of descent is the slope—doing the whole thing for ourselves. But the women being, as Mrs. Poyser says, made to match the men, our progress was bound to take other, as well as serious, directions. I wonder if the modern débutante condescends to "chocolate cream" wagers, as we used to do. It depends, no doubt, on the extent of her modernity. Some girls "come out" now finished women of the world, not only willing to teach their grandmothers, but capable of teaching them too.

The first day of Punchestown was a real good day's outing in the sense of allowing one to feel happy out of doors. Grumblers took exception to the cold wind, and without it, no doubt, would have grumbled at the heat of the sunshine. Lord and Lady Cadogan, with their visitors and a Viceregal suite, drove up the course in the State carriages just before the first race. Lord Londonderry, who, with his daughter, Lady Helen Stewart, was one of the party, was received with great friendliness. He had his arm in a sling, as also had another Viceregal guest, Lady Gerard. The Punchestown "house party" was not so large as usual at the Viceregal Lodge. It included several members of Lord Cadogan's family, Lord and Lady Chelsea, lately returned from abroad, Lady Lurgan, Lady Sophie Scott, and the Honourables Gerald, E., and A. Cadogan.

Lord and Lady Mayo brought a large party from Palmerston, Lord Coventry, Mr. C. Coventry, Lord and Lady Huntingdon, Lord Connemara, Lord and Lady Rossmore, Mr. Gerald and Lady Maria Ponsonby. Colonel Crichton's guests included Lady Annesley and Lord Enniskillen—whose daughter, Lady Kathleen Cole, was with the Viceregal party. Lord and Lady Downe, with their daughters, came from the Curragh, and the Lord Chief Justice, Sir Peter O'Brien, with a number of visitors from Castletown. Sir Peter is quite a Kildare and hunting man now; at Punchestown the dread chief administrator of law and order in Ireland was completely merged in the smiling and genial Steward of the National Races. Other representatives of the Irish Bench were also to be seen, including Mr. Justice Ross and Mr. Justice Madden. Lord Roberts chaperoned his daughters, and headed the list of stewards of the military races.

The enclosure was a brilliant sight in the sunshine, when wraps were in abeyance—a regular spring costume garden. Every one gets new frocks, and, above all, new headgear—the most discriminating eye cannot differentiate more closely on the latter subject—for Punchestown. The season forbids the airy extravagances of Ascot, and what is called the fullest dress, the general dress impression being of the tailor-made kind—with extra elaboration, however. Lady Cadogan wore brown cloth, trimmed with black braid, with an elaborate black and blue toque, or was it a bonnet? On the second day her costume was prettier, pink roses and green leaves on her head, a fawn cloth dress, with a short jacket with wide white and black revers. The amount of mixed costumes of blue and violet in every variety of shade was quite remarkable on Wednesday. They were worn by Ladies Lurgan, Sophie Scott, Helen Stewart, Huntingdon, and many others. One only caught occasional glimpses of them, however, as the showery weather of that day brought macintoshes and tweed capes greatly in evidence. It was quite different from Tuesday. One of the most distinguished-looking toilets was Lady Chelsea's, very pale grey, with a Russian blouse of astrachan and a mauve hat. Lady Milton looked youthful in a black moiré velours dress and big hat; Lady Annesley wore grey, as also did Lady Fingall, Lady Lettrington, and Lady Aline Beaumont. Lady Blake seemed to enjoy revisiting her native land, and was, no doubt, able to give a good deal of information regarding the Cuban question, after all her West Indian experiences. Much needed, too. What an insight one gets into the ignorance of "society" when any new "question" arises. How few know any geography even, except what one might call that of their own set. Military hospitality was, as usual, dispensed with much prodigality, and luncheons and teas were given by several of the leading Dublin Clubs. We were guilty of more than one tea. Is there any more seductive meal for a day out? Does not the Queen show an excellent example to her subjects in her patronage of it? Apropos of Royalty, the courtiers in the enclosure were quite enthusiastic when the horse of the Prince of Wales came in a winner in one of the races.

The Leopardstown days were most dreadful, especially Saturday. April could not have been more spiteful, even renouncing its fickle character in favour of unmitigated bad weather. And yet the army of martyrs of both sexes who attended the race meeting was very large.—Yours ever, CLARE.

HUNTING.—An elegant and graceful up-to-date figure is created by the easy and perfect fit of the ingenious and appropriate Stays built by Mesdames SYKES, JOSEPHINE, & Co., The Celebrated Anatomical Corsetières, 280, Regent-st., Oxford-circus, London, W.

la Cardinal. The prawns make it a very attractive dish :—

Fillet a pair of nice soles and put the bones on to make stock for the sauce. Trim the fillets, season them with pepper, salt, and lemon juice, fold the fillets over and place them, with the ends curved to the centre, on a saucepan, season them with pepper, salt, and lemon juice, moisten them with a little stock from the bones, cover them with a greased paper and cook them in a moderate oven for twenty minutes. Remove the shells from the body, but not from the heads, of a dozen fine prawns and warm them in a little stock in the oven. Arrange the fillets in a circle, pour the pink sauce over all and stick a prawn, in an upright position, on each one. The sauce is made in this way :—Dissolve an ounce of butter in a stewpan, mix in a dessertspoon of flour and the fish stock, stir it until boiling and strain. Return the sauce to the stewpan, season with pepper, salt, and lemon juice, add the yolk of an egg, a little cream, and a teaspoonful of lobster spawn previously passed through a hair sieve.

Bouchées à l'aspic are a charming cold entrée :—

Pound the breast of a chicken, or half a pound of white veal, add the yolk of an egg and two tablespoonfuls of white sauce, season it with salt and pepper, and rub through a fine wire sieve. Now work the forcemeat in a basin with a wooden spoon, adding half a pint of thick cream gradually, mix in a tablespoonful of chopped tongue and a teaspoonful of chopped truffle. Steam it in small, buttered bouchée moulds, which may be decorated with diamond-shaped pieces of truffle and tongue. When they are quite cold cover each one with cold, liquid aspic, and allow them to set. Meanwhile, cut some cold carrots, beetroot, and potatoes, with a pea-shaped cutter, mix them with thick mayonnaise sauce, adding a few green peas, season them with salt and cayenne pepper. Now form the vegetables into a dome in the centre of a dish, make a border of chopped aspic, and arrange the creams, the round side upwards, all over the top, garnish the interstices with chopped aspic and sprigs of watercress.

You will find these little puddings à la Princess Maud very delicate :—

Rub two tablespoonfuls of apricot jam through a wire sieve and put it with 3 whole eggs and a tablespoonful of vanilla sugar into an egg-bowl. Whisk it over a stewpan of boiling water on the stove for twenty minutes, add 5 sheets of dissolved gelatine, and continue whisking it until it is cold. Then add ½ pint of whipped cream, and pour it at once into small, wetted moulds. Turn it out and serve apricot sauce round it. For which :—Mix two tablespoonfuls of apricot jam with a wineglass of sherry and a few drops of vanilla essence, then rub it through a hair sieve.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

Messrs. GAY & BIRD will publish in a few days, A NEW VOLUME by Mrs. WIGGIN, entitled Penelope's Experiences in Scotland.

By KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN.

Author of "Timothy's Quest," "Cathedral Courtship and Penelope's English Experiences," "Marm Lisa," &c.

Crown 8vo, pp. 300, appropriately bound, 6s.

Undoubtedly Mrs. Wiggin's best work in humour.

Mrs. Wiggins is so charmed with Scotland and Scotch people that it is impossible for her humour to be anything but good-natured and delightful.

This volume is similar in every way to "A Cathedral Courtship and Penelope's English Experiences" of which Punch wrote:—"There is only one word that will fittingly describe this work; it is delightful."

ALSO NEARLY READY.

In the Days of King James, or, Romances of London in the Olden Time.

By SIDNEY HERBERT BURCHELL.

Crown 8vo, pp. 300, tastefully bound, 6s.

Partly historical, but chiefly of human interest, these stories rivet the attention to the end. We follow the fortunes of the high-born Lady Verney, or Cicely, the Bookseller's daughter, or Nell of the Aldgate with unbated interest.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD'S GREAT WORK.

JUST READY.

Royal 4to, extra cloth, bevelled boards, gilt edges, 232 pages, 9s. net, a companion volume to the now famous "Sixty Years a Queen."

IMPORTANT AND PATRIOTIC WORK.

NELSON AND HIS TIMES.

BY

Rear-Admiral Lord CHARLES BERESFORD, M.P., and H. W. WILSON (OF THE NAVY LEAGUE).

Printed on art paper, profusely illustrated throughout by art blocks, together with coloured frontispiece (Thomas Davidson's famous picture), "On Hostile Ground," illustrating the landing of Nelson at Copenhagen.

Many of the illustrations are reproductions of well-known marine pictures, and numerous portraits embellish the work.

Several hitherto unpublished letters from Lord Nelson are included, some of which appear in fac-simile.

The life history of one of our greatest national heroes, and at the same time the history of the British Navy at a period when its record was teeming with brilliant achievements and splendid personalities.

Illustrations from Turner, Reynolds, Roberts, Hoare, Westall, Gainsborough, West, Maclise, Orme, Romney, Vernet, Lawrence, Gillray, Cruikshank, Rowlandson, Woodward, Ernest Prater, Dixon, &c., &c.

"Of such memoirs as the one under consideration it may safely be said that the world cannot have too many. . . . Sir Herbert Maxwell is fortunate in having for his subject so admirable a type of British character, and he has succeeded in making his memoir entirely worthy of its subject. . . . We could quote many good things from this pleasant and well-written memoir but space will not permit it. We must be content to direct our readers' attention to what is certainly a vivid portraiture."—Daily Chronicle.
